That so much of section seven of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, as relates to the publication of the treaties and laws, be, and the same is hereby, extended to the States not therein designated, and to the Territories; and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, upon receiving notice of the designation of newspapers under the act aforesaid and this section, promptly to furnish to such newspapers authentic copies of the treaties and laws of the United States as aforesaid; Provided, It shall be lawful to print the laws and treaties of the United States as aforesaid in three newspapers in Louisiana.

And that the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the objects hereinafter expressed for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, namely:

For stationery for the House of Representatives, $9,000.

For newspapers, $10,000.

For miscellaneous items, $10,000.

And that there be, and hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for salaries of Commissioner of Education and his clerks, $9,400; for furnishing offices and for stationery, $6,000.

Mr. LAFLIN. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] if his amendment provides for the publication of the laws in the loyal States under the same rules and regulations which were provided at the last session for their publication in the disloyal States?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is the same provision which was passed by the House at this session and sent to the Senate, with this addition, that it directs the Secretary of State to furnish copies of the laws to be published.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] permit me to offer an amendment to his amendment?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will hear it read.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to insert after the proviso in the paragraph relating to the publication of the laws the following:

And provided further, That the Daily Morning Chronicle and Daily Evening Leader of the city of Washington are hereby designated as the two papers in which the advertisements mentioned in the tenth section of the above-recited act shall be published until otherwise ordered by Congress, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. That is a little too bald, I think. We have never named any papers in our laws.

Mr. LOGAN. By a resolution passed on the last night of the last session of the last Congress it was provided that the papers heretofore named by the Clerk should do certain printing.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. We passed a law by which the two papers in the District having the largest circulation should have the printing. If that gives the Star and the Chronicle the printing I do not propose myself to disturb the arrangement by naming a new paper in place of one of them, although I may prefer its politics. I prefer to leave the matter as it now stands.

Mr. BROOKS. In the noise and confusion here I am not quite certain that I understand the object of the provision in relation to the printing of the laws. Is it to take from the Secretary of State and give to the Clerk of this House the selection of papers throughout the United States for the publication of the laws?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Laws and treaties.

Mr. BROOKS. The publication of both laws and treaties?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know that I shall object to that, for I think it will bring the Clerk of the House of Representatives in collision with about two thirds of the Radical newspapers of the country.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. We will want a little hot blood during this summer. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRADING CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The other day I had ordered to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations a bill from the Senate, not thinking at the time that there was no such committee yet appointed. The Senate deem the passage of the bill important at this time. It is Senate bill No. 64, to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes. It is an appropriation of $20,000, and affects our comfort here. I ask that the motion to refer be reconsidered, and that it be again put upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the bill contains an appropriation will it not have to be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not ask that the bill be put upon its passage at this time; merely that it be placed upon the Speaker's table the same as if no order had been made in regard to its reference.

No objection was made, and the bill was accordingly again placed upon the Speaker's table.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas "religion, morality, and knowledge are," in the language of Jefferson in the Ordinance of 1787, "necessary to the good government and the happiness of mankind," therefore schools and the means of education should be everywhere established; and whereas from various causes the interests of popular education have been so greatly neglected in the States lately in rebellion that nearly one half of the voting population therein are at the present time unable to read and write; and whereas such a state of things cannot long continue with safety to the nation or to the best interests, prosperity, and happiness of the people of those States: Therefore,

Resolved, That this House expresses its earnest hope that the people of the States lately in insurrection will, in reorganizing the same in accordance with existing laws for that purpose, insert in their respective State constitutions a provision requiring the Legislature to establish and maintain a system of free schools which shall afford adequate opportunity for public education to all the children of the State.

TESTIMONY AFFECTING A SENATOR.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, at the request of a Senator:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be, and is hereby, instructed to furnish to Senator PATTERSON a certified copy of the testimony given by David A. Hull, an officer of this House, before said committee in its investigations of the New York custom-house frauds.

Mr. HULBURD. I object.

Mr. BALDWIN, (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION FROM UTAH TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William McGrorty to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, announcing his intention to contest the right of Hon. WILLIAM H. HOOPER to a seat as a Delegate from Utah Territory; which was referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 25, 1867.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate its resolution passed on the 23d instant fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress, and sent to the House for concurrence.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the request of the Senate will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was Ordered, That the Clerk return to the Senate, in accordance with its request, the resolution fixing the day for the adjournment of Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked indefinite leave of absence for Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Leave was granted.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, asked indefinite leave of absence for Mr. SHELLABARGER.

Leave was granted.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SCHENCK asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the memorial of Vice Admiral Porter in behalf of the widow and children of D. P. Heap, late a paymaster in the United States Army.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES.

The first business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 18) entitled "An act declaring a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near the town of St. Charles, and a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi river at or near the city of Louisiana, in the State of Missouri, and a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river, at or near Leavenworth, Kansas, to be legal structures and post roads;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope that this bill will be put upon its passage now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads when appointed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion. It is very important that this bill should be passed at the present session.

Mr. LOAN. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion to refer until the gentleman from Missouri shall have offered his amendment.

Mr. LOAN. I move to amend by adding at the end of section five the following:

Provided, That the company or parties building said bridge shall first obtain authority for the construction thereof from the States of Missouri and Kansas.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed. This seems to be a more appropriate committee than the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion to allow me to offer an amendment, which is to add these words:

Provided, That such bridges shall not be a serious impediment to the navigation of the river.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that is already in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Those words are in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on the motion to refer.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

On the motion to refer there were—ayes 41, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. BENJAMIN and HOLMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill and pending amendment were ordered to be referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOAN. I ask unanimous consent that the following proposed amendment may be referred to the Committee on Commerce along with the bill just referred to that committee:

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, a corporation organized under and by authority of the laws of the State of Kansas, its successors or assigns, is authorized and empowered to construct a bridge across the Missouri river at or within two miles of the corporate limits of the city of St. Joseph, Missouri, upon the same terms and conditions provided for in this act in relation to the bridges at St. Charles and Louisiana: Provided, That the consent of the State of Missouri shall be obtained before the work on said bridge is commenced.

There was no objection, and the amendment was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

DIPLOMATIC COSTUME.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 39, concerning the uniform of persons in the diplomatic service of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that all persons in the diplomatic service of the United States are prohibited from wearing any uniform or special costume not previously authorized by Congress.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the joint resolution be put upon its passage, and demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs some reason for passing a resolution of that kind.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a question well understood, I am sure, by every member of this House. It prohibits the wearing of uniforms at the Courts of Europe or elsewhere by persons in the diplomatic service of the United States except that authorized by Congress. It is so clear a question that, in my judgment, argument in its support is not at all needed.

Mr. SPALDING. I think a citizen's dress which answers for a citizen in society in our own country ought to be good enough for any person in our diplomatic service at any foreign Court. I am opposed to any uniform or court dress being worn by any of our diplomatic representatives abroad. The resolution is a good one, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. BANKS. It is to require that the diplomatic representatives of this country at foreign Courts shall wear citizen's dress. Officers of the Army and Navy will of course be privileged to wear the uniform of their rank. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. This resolution sounds very democratic. The provision, I believe, is simple and short, that no representative of our Government abroad shall wear a costume of any kind unless prescribed by Congress. As Congress has never prescribed any it means, if it means anything, that they shall wear none at all. [Laughter.] They shall wear, says my colleague, a citizen's dress. Will any gentleman tell me what is the citizen's dress of any citizen of the United States? The gentleman says it is a dress coat and a white cravat. I suppose he will also include white gloves.

I know an instance of a consul of the United States, an excellent gentleman from Virginia, who came out under Mr. Marcy's administration, when I had the honor myself to be abroad. He represented to me that he was full of the idea of complying with the Democratic order which Mr. Marcy had just made, that our officers abroad should only appear in citizen's costume. He desired to appear at the Court of his Imperial Majesty of Brazil, and I told him that he would find it rather awkward to go in that way. However, I give an intimation to the minister of foreign affairs and it was arranged, although contrary to the etiquette of the Court, that he should go as he desired. He determined to wear a chapeau claque so as not to show what is never seen at Court, a big round hat. He put on what he supposed to be the dress intended by his Government, a black swallow-tail coat, white cravat, and white kid gloves. We were received in the ante-room. He was the only blackbird among the representatives of all the different nations who were there with their secretaries and with officers of the army and navy of the respective countries who sought to be presented. This American consul alone in this garb was seen finally by one of the chamberlains.

Mr. SPALDING. What did the gentleman wear himself?

Mr. SCHENCK. If my colleague is curious I will tell him presently.

I saw the chamberlain whispering to the French minister and pointing to this gentleman. The French minister came over after awhile and said to me, "Is he not the new American consul?" I told him that he was. He then said that the chamberlain had mistaken him for one of the servants who had intruded himself into the ante-room, [laughter,] it being understood that servants everywhere abroad dressed precisely in that style, with white cravat, black coat, and white gloves. I interposed with the chamberlain, going to him and giving the proper explanation, that it was according to the order of the minister of foreign affairs in case this consul should insist on being presented in that way. The consul went in. When we came out from the audience room, backing out in the usual way, I wanted him to pause in another ante-room and look around at the two hundred dignitaries of the church and Court, because he had probably never seen such an array, and it was a matter of interest to me as well as to him. "No," said he, "for God's sake let us get out of it. I feel like a fool. I know they are laughing at me, for I heard the Empress say something to her maids of honor, and I saw the grin on their faces. I am sure it was all about me. If God will forgive me, no matter what Mr. Marcy's order may be, I never will come to Court again, if I come at all, and make such a booby of myself by trying to look different from everybody else."

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to know what the gentleman wore?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman wants to know what I wore.

Mr. SPALDING. I do.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I wore the ordinary court costume, which is a blue coat with an embroidered wreath around and upon the lapels and cuffs. I did it because I was unwilling to appear singular, and for the same reason that I would not go in my shirt-sleeves to a party here in the United States. I did it because I was unwilling to appear differently from the usage prevailing in the country where I was.

Now, the exception to this is, and they are always glad to see such exceptions, that persons who have filled military positions in the Army and Navy who go abroad are considered as completely en règle, for they wear the uniform to which they have been entitled as officers of the Army or Navy. This resolution I suppose is for the purpose of stripping anybody who may be sent abroad who is entitled to wear the Army and Navy costume. It certainly does that.

A MEMBER. Oh no, that is prescribed by Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. That may be the uniform prescribed by Congress; it is not the uniform prescribed by Congress for persons abroad at Court. In our own country, in the Army and Navy, it might be considered as prescribed by Congress, but we have none whatever abroad.

Now, all I have to say is, it seems to me the Congress of the United States is dabbling in a very small matter when it insists that while it does not prescribe anything that shall be worn by our representatives abroad, those representatives shall be put under bonds not to wear anything which will prevent them from appearing singular when they go abroad. That is the whole of it. If Congress will prescribe a Court dress, no matter how much it may resemble, for instance, the suit of my friend who sits before me, [Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri,] let it be complied with. But this resolution does not propose any such thing. It does not propose an American eagle on the collar, or a black coat or a blue coat or a plain coat or an embroidered coat; but it simply says they shall not wear any uniform whatever until Congress shall prescribe one. But it does not seem at all probable that Congress will prescribe one. Certainly this resolution does not propose to do it.

The truth is, in attempting to avoid making ourselves ridiculous we shall only succeed in making ourselves ridiculous. I know what the argument is. I know that it is said that the dignity of an American citizen should be his passport everywhere, and we are told to look at Benjamin Franklin, who went to the Court of France in the days of the greatest formality and ceremony in the public service, and wore a plain citizen's dress. But what was that dress? My friend from Massachusetts would present a most singular figure, I apprehend, with a plum-colored coat lined with white or colored satin, knee-breeches, and a three-cornered hat.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman will allow me, it was the citizen's dress of the State of Pennsylvania, honorable in that State to all men who were entitled to wear it, as Benjamin Franklin was; and any other costume than that which he wore would not have been a badge calculated to do credit to the one who wore it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; if the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will amend his resolution so as to prescribe what shall be an American costume there will be something practical in it. But the trouble is it does not prescribe anything. You only say to the people abroad in their several Courts: "We defy you: we are democrats: this is a matter of usage and taste and not of law; but while we conform to usage in our own country, we expect when we go abroad to conform to our own usage there and not to yours. We are independent of all the world; we lay down the rule at home, and we lay down the rule with you; and we do not mean to depart from that which we regard as the true rule upon this subject, as democratic American citizens, wherever we may be."

Now, I hold that true politeness consists in complying, to a reasonable degree at least, so as not to appear singular, with the usages of the country, its courts and assemblies of every kind, where you may happen to be. If you do not do that, then you will have no rule at all. The bob-tail business coat, whether drab, or blue or green, any and every one, will be equally in order under the law you now propose to pass.

Mr. GARFIELD. They are hanging men and women in Ireland for "Wearing of the green."

Mr. SCHENCK. It may be said that I am taking a very anti-democratic view of this subject. But I am taking the common-sense view, the one to avoid ridicule. And I say to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and to this House that for a man to go to a public assembly abroad, where a certain usage in regard to costume generally prevails, and to insist upon the singularity of wearing whatever he may have been accustomed to wear on his farm, in his shop, or his office, or at an evening party at home, and to refuse to conform to the rules and the usages of the country where he may happen to be, is to put himself in opposition to and to fight against laws, which, after all, are stronger than any law upon your statute-book, the laws of society. And I tell you he will feel, just as my friend from Virginia, the consul, felt, that he has made himself ridiculous by his affected singularity, and that the Secretary of State at home made a mistake; and with all his democracy, of which he so boasted, he will take care the next time he goes to Court to conform, at least to a reasonable extent, with the usages that prevail there, so as not to be laughed at; or he will stay away altogether.

And I say even more than that; I say, not to comply to a certain extent with the usages of a country to which a man may go as the representative of this country, little as it may seem proper that it should be so, is, to a certain extent, to impair his usefulness. I have known an American minister to be able to obtain concessions from a foreign Government, and to obtain an advantage of the ministers of two or three of the principal Powers of the world without any sacrifice of his own self-respect, but merely by yielding a little to the prejudices and usages of the country in relation to mere matters of social life.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD,] who was at Berlin, I have no doubt can tell us something upon this subject. Perhaps the gentleman from Berlin has never worn a Court costume of any kind; I do not know how that may be. But he is a gentleman, I know, to be able to climb the ladder [laughter] of fame either in one dress or another. And I shall be happy to hear from him upon this subject. But before I yield the floor for that purpose I wish to say a word further.

Usages abroad are very different in this respect. As I understand some Courts are much more liberal than others. Some I know are very great sticklers for these apparently immaterial formalities and ceremonies. But whether all those formalities are to a very great degree dispensed with, as in our court at the other end of the avenue, or whether they stickle for them to a very great extent as they do in most of the Spanish and Portuguese Courts, in either case there may be something gained by conforming to some extent to those customs. Certainly there is a risk that something may be lost if we say to those countries, "We not only expect to control our own social matters at home, but when we go abroad we mean to let you people of old countries understand that we will defy all your customs and habits in this regard."

I now yield to the gentleman from Berlin, [Mr. JUDD,] with the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. JUDD. I do not quite like to be considered the Representative of Berlin upon this floor, because that might impose upon me the necessity of speaking in German. Now, my knowledge of German is not sufficient to enable me to make what might be called a great speech in it. [Laughter.]

There is some force in the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] There is perhaps some little annoyance at times and under certain circumstances in being presented in society in a costume different from that worn by persons about us. But that very difficulty is incurred by every man from a foreign nation possessing a peculiar kind of costume. The Turk appears at a foreign Court in the costume he wears before his sovereign at home. The representative of the Greeks, even the ladies of some nations, appear in the peculiar costumes and head-dresses at foreign Courts that they wear at home. Each nation indicates to its diplomatic corps what costume it desires them to wear when they officially represent their nation.

The difficulty in the practice of this Government has been that we have had no rule upon the subject; and each of our representatives abroad has been at liberty to put on any kind of togery (if I may use that expression) that he saw fit, whether his taste was good or bad. Mr. Marcy undertook to regulate this matter, under the pressure, as my friend from Ohio would say, of the public sentiment of the country; but he failed. He gave advice to our representatives abroad, but he issued no orders. Hence, it was left to each gentleman representing the country at a foreign Court to do as he pleased in this respect.

General Jackson, as I am told, undertook to prescribe a uniform by saying—and I do not know but instructions were issued—that a republican representative should appear in a black suit of clothes, with a sword in a scabbard at his side, a star on his breast, and a chapeau, indicating his republican position, and getting rid of all the tinsel that is sometimes put upon the shoulders of our representatives, with no meaning in it except as a show.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, it would be well if a uniform, simple in itself, but indicative of the character and citizenship of the representative, should be prescribed by Congress or by the State Department; but until this is done I am in favor of restricting our representatives abroad to a suit of clothes similar to that which they wear when presented to the head of their own Government. I cannot perceive the embarrassment which the gentleman from Ohio seems to think would grow out of this requirement. I know perfectly well that the servants in those royal palaces are, when dressed in black, among the best-dressed gentlemen in the country; and I know that not only at royal entertainments, but at entertainments in private families, where the uniform is not demanded, but where royalty attends, it is customary for Americans to appear in what would be called in this country an evening dress. And, Mr. Speaker, at the place where I had the honor to serve as a representative, if any gentleman had accompanied me clad in citizen's dress, although it might have attracted attention, yet I do not think it would have been the subject-matter of comment. All objection to such a dress would, I think, be removed were it understood at foreign Courts that the dress is worn by direction of the Government, not by the mere choice of the representative. Our representatives would then stand in a position precisely corresponding to that which the representatives of other Governments occupy upon this question.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this resolution. I would not support it if, as apprehended by the gentleman from Ohio, it prevented gentlemen holding military positions from wearing their uniforms. It seems to me highly proper that they should do so. But I understand there is at present an act of Congress authorizing military officers to wear their uniforms upon such occasions, official or otherwise, as they deem proper. This resolution, as I understand, will not interfere with that privilege. I believe such of our diplomats as may have military honors will still have the privilege wherever they may be. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will correct me if I am mistaken.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that we shall pass this resolution. I do not think it beneath our dignity that by act of Congress or by the action of some official of the Government we should prescribe some insignia for our representatives abroad. The gentleman from Ohio indicated what it seemed to me would be a very proper insignia. It should be something indicative of our nationality, so that we may get rid of this surplus tinsel which has no meaning—these gewgaws which might be fit for a child to wear, but which do not speak well for our country or for the individual who wears them.

Mr. BANKS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COVODE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BANKS. I will yield to hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all diplomatic agents shall not be permitted to wear any Court dress except such as shall be prescribed, and the pattern drawn and fashioned by the chief tailor of this nation, who is now presiding over its destinies.

[Great laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. I will accept the gentleman's amendment when he is willing to give that officer the supreme direction in all other affairs.

Mr. COVODE. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. NOELL. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The uniform prescribed by this act shall be as follows: cocked hat looped up with the American eagle; swallow-tailed coat with the stars and stripes upon the tail, and the words marked in worsted, "Protective Tariff;" butternut pantaloons, closely fitting; yellow stockings with garters à la Franklin; round-toed shoes of the latest Lowell fashions; buckskin vest, one side black and the other white, indicative of no distinction on account of color; pinchbeck breastpin with inscription, "Economy is wealth."

The reading of the amendment was greeted with repeated peals of laughter.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot consent to that amendment being offered.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Is it in order to move to refer the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Not without the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts while he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BANKS. I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to have permission to submit the substitute which I send up to the Clerk's desk, and to say a few words on it:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to prescribe such uniform for the use of the diplomatic representatives of the United States as he may deem proper.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit that to be offered.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise simply for the purpose of making an inquiry in order to guide my vote. If I understand the exception it allows every person who is or has been a military officer in this country to appear in Court costume or military dress when in a European court. Am I right?

Mr. BANKS. The resolution, as I understand, will allow the diplomatic representative of this country who has been in the Army or Navy of the United States to wear the uniform of his rank.

Mr. BROOKS. Does it mean actually serving in the Army at the time, a regular officer of the Army or Navy?

Mr. BANKS. If he has been a volunteer during the late rebellion he is entitled by the laws of his country wherever he goes to wear the uniform of the highest rank which he held. If he should be a diplomatic representative he will be entitled to wear that uniform abroad. If he is not, and has not been in the Army or Navy, he will of course not be entitled to wear the uniform of either.

Mr. BROOKS. If he has been a major general, a colonel, or lieutenant of militia called out during the last rebellion and in actual service he will, I understand, be entitled to wear his uniform.

Mr. BANKS. It only refers to those who are entitled to wear uniform under the act of Congress of 1866.

Mr. BROOKS. According the explanation of the gentleman from Massachusetts this becomes a matter of interest to gentlemen on both sides of the House who have not been military officers. As it now stands the disqualification will be large. There are all over the House some seven or eight major generals in the Army of the United States, and several colonels, but the large majority have been neither colonels nor major generals; and in case of service abroad they would not be entitled to wear the uniform, the court dress of the Army. These gentlemen would be compelled to appear in plain citizen's dress. I submit, if the gentleman intends to press his resolution, that he should cut off all exceptions whatever, so that every citizen who goes as a minister to a foreign Court shall be required to appear in the dress of his country, whatever may be the fashion. It ought to have that bearing to carry out his purpose. I am opposed to any exclusive resolution in favor of military gentlemen who may happen to be on this floor or elsewhere.

Mr. PRUYN. Does the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BANKS. I do.

Mr. PRUYN. I entered this Hall when the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK] late minister I believe to Brazil, was speaking on this subject. I myself very cordially concurred in those of his remarks which I heard, and following out the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD] who admitted the propriety of some costume or some insignia for our foreign ministers, I drafted a brief amendment to the resolution, which I sent to the Chair for the purpose of presenting the views of the gentleman in a practical manner.

Now, sir, I am authorized in saying, from repeated visits to the other side of the Atlantic, that as a general thing our ministers abroad have behaved with very great good sense and commendable propriety in this matter, and that as a general thing they have attended the Courts of the sovereigns of the country to which they were accredited in plain costume such as gentlemen would wear here, that is with an evening dress such as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has spoken of. But I agree with him, and with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD] that there are occasions when in this respect it is best for the interest of the country that our representatives should not be hampered by a rule of this kind.

What is this resolution? On its face it admits the propriety of a uniform. It only says it shall not be used or worn until Congress prescribes one. That is, the two Houses of Congress are to fix and settle the details of a dress to be worn by gentlemen three or five thousand miles from home. Now, I submit that that is not our province or duty, and we had better send it, as the gentleman from Illinois proposes, to the Executive or to the proper Department of the Government. If this resolution should say that until Congress acts the Secretary of State or the President may prescribe a uniform it would be very much improved. But it proceeds on the assumption that a uniform ought to be worn and that it is proper to have one, and still it does not prescribe one. It seems to me if we are going to meddle with the matter at all we had better see that some rule is adopted by which a uniform can be agreed upon and settled. It is with that view that I suggest that this should be referred to the Department of State, where it properly belongs; otherwise I hope it will be laid on the table.

Mr. BANKS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. It was my intention to move to refer this to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and for that purpose I have reduced the motion to writing in these words:

That the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to report a uniform to be worn by the representatives of the Government of the United States at foreign Courts.

My object was, inasmuch as this resolution proposes and does nothing, or worse than nothing, to try and get something done. But the gentleman from New York has anticipated substantially what I was going to propose by a reference. It can be done by an amendment directing the Secretary of State to recommend something instead of having the Committee on Foreign Affairs consider and report upon it. As I may not be able to get a vote on referring it to that committee, I shall therefore vote for the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.]

Mr. BANKS. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to make an exception in favor of our diplomatic representatives to the Barbary States. This matter of ornament and display may be to us but a very trivial thing; but it is well known that with the Oriental nations it is regarded as of very essential importance. In order that our representatives should have a proper reception at the Court of the Bey it is necessary for them to wear a uniform of some description, and the more gorgeous its character the greater the impression it makes. And even in their ordinary intercourse with the people it is necessary; and they are in the habit of wearing some badge, such as a diplomatic cap, with a gold band and an eagle in front, to indicate the character in which they appear, in order to enable them to command proper respect, and even to secure them from violence.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, this is not my resolution. I would not have proposed any change in this matter to the House of my own option. But it comes to us from the Senate. It has passed that body, and it has to be considered here. Of course we are to give it such consideration as the subject is entitled to, and there are many things to be said in its favor. I did not expect any objection would be made to a regulation so manifestly proper. I supposed it would be received here, as it has been received elsewhere, with instantaneous and general assent. The various propositions which have been suggested by way of amendment I accept as the best the opponents of the measure can offer.

With regard to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] styles the discrimination in favor of the uniform of the Army and Navy of the United States I think this ought to be said: it may be a discrimination not acceptable to gentlemen on the other side of the House, but to a man entitled to wear it the privilege is of great value. It is a badge of honor. It shows he has served his country and periled his life in defense of its liberties, and that by order of his Government he is entitled to appear in it wherever he may be. If it is a discrimination in his favor, it is one which he has richly earned. If he is an officer of the Army or Navy, I conceive nothing can be more clear than that he should be entitled to wear the dress prescribed for him by the Government whenever he is assigned to other duties than those which lie in the exact line of his profession. Thus much in regard to the discrimination in favor of discharged volunteers or of officers of the Army and Navy to which the gentleman refers. It is in favor of the men only who defended the liberties of their country by their blood or at the peril of their lives.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has suggested that it is the duty of our diplomatic representatives to conform to some considerable extent to the customs of the country to which they may be accredited. That he styles the rule of politeness. Unquestionably when a man is in a country not his own, or when a citizen visits a circle where he is not of right privileged, he should conform to the customs of the country or the habits of the persons he visits. That is the rule of politeness. But it is not the law of business men; and diplomatic representatives go from this country to represent this Government at foreign Courts upon matters of business. He does not assume the character of the nation he visits; he represents his own. That is his business. No exception can be taken to it. In receiving a minister from this country every foreign Government recognizes and tolerates, where it does not interfere with its safety or its rights, the customs of the country represented. Any course of conduct on the part of our representatives that imposes a departure from our customs, and an adoption of those of other countries, would be in the way of servility rather than civility, and ought not to be approved.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] has suggested that the Secretary of State should prescribe a uniform. Sir, that is the very idea that those who support this resolution are combating. We do not want these Court costumes; they do not belong to our Government; they are not required by any consideration of necessity, expediency, or propriety; they do not belong to our people; they are not accustomed to them, and therefore they should not be obliged to adopt them.

Mr. SCHENCK. When our ministers abroad are engaged in the transaction of business they dress as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is now dressed. It is only upon occasions of ceremony that a different dress is required.

Mr. BANKS. The representation of this country upon occasions of ceremony is essentially and exclusively a matter of business. It is upon such occasions that we ought to be represented as we are, and not as we are not. The representatives of other Governments on such occasions wear the costumes of the countries by which they are accredited, and to which the higher class of people are accustomed. They are thus truly representatives of their respective nations. That is exactly what we should demand of our representatives. They should represent Americans according to the customs of their country. He will thus do for his own country what other diplomatic agents do for theirs. Diplomacy is not merely an affair of compliment or courtesy, but of substantial and serious business; and in the discharge of his duties he should appear as an American, and an American only, and in that costume to which an American is accustomed, which his countrymen would appreciate, in which he would appear if summoned before the representatives of the people, the Supreme Court or the Chief Executive Magistrate of the nation.

It has been suggested that the adoption of the customary Court costumes is necessary, because to set them aside would make men appear singular. Let me suppose a case: suppose the late President of the United States before he was elected to the high office in which he surrendered his life had been sent as a representative of this Government to the Court of St. James or any other foreign Court. As he came to us from the great West he was essentially and truly an American citizen, an American representative. Where is the man who for a single moment would have recommended that, in order to avoid the singular appearance which he would have presented in the customary costume of his whole life, and which was as natural to him as his movements or his person, he should have been put into Court costume not his own, and exhibited himself, for the first time in his life, in a bag wig, cocked hat, knee-breeches, silk stockings, and a sword at his side, with whatever else the custom of the larger or lesser Courts of Europe might require? In which garb would the world have best seen the natural man? In which would he to us have seemed most singular? Who of those he represented would have preferred to see him in this plight, in trumpery which he had never worn, which did not belong to him, which was never recognized by his Government, and which would make him appear to be anything else than what he was, or in that simple manly American dress which he has made his own as it was that of his country, and in which his form is to be transmitted to after ages? In which would he have been most at home? In which would he have been least singular? There cannot be a doubt that in the eyes of his countrymen, in the eyes of those who rightly appreciate the country he represented, it would be in that alone in which we knew him and loved him.

There have been many men at these receptions at foreign courts who in this respect have been "singular." Napoleon wore always the uniform of the consular guard, Abd-el-Kader wore the dress of his country. Suppose that any man at any of those courts had mistaken Abd-el-Kader or Napoleon for a common man, of what account would that have been to them or the Governments they represented? And suppose that an American representing this country at the court of England or France or Austria should wear the dress in which he appears before the President or in Congress or the Supreme Court and should be mistaken by some chamberlain or subordinate officer for a man of no account. We may say that by and by, when accustomed to their costumes and acquainted with their history, and comprehending their future, they will know and understand American citizens better. They will not long nor often mistake them for servants, either of courts or of Governments not their own.

An American representative in the dress of an American citizen, at any of the Courts of Europe, represents this Government in matters of business. He stands in the costume of his country as of his time, as Franklin did of his country and of his time; and any man who mistakes him for a servant of anybody deludes himself and does us no damage. Turgot said, in France, in 1749, when inaugurated in an ecclesiastical office in France, at the age of twenty-two, that the day was near when the American States would achieve their independence of England and play before the world the great rôle which Carthage played in ancient history. If any man at any of the European Courts should ask, who is it that amid the throng of gilded courtiers appears in a simple suit of black, even with the white cravat, which so much alarms us? the answer is: that it is an American, representing a country which at a day not distant, with nobler purposes and a happier destiny, will play before the world the game which Carthage played in earlier ages.

I do not doubt that a dress distinctively American will cause some comments in the Courts of Europe. I do not doubt, sir, what has been so clearly stated by the gentleman from Ohio, that there are officers of other Governments who will smile at an American representative clad simply as an American citizen; and there may be men who will wilt under such rigorous treatment, and perhaps seek to withdraw not only from the circle of ceremony, but even from the service of the Government. But such men are not fit to be representatives of this country anywhere, either abroad or at home, now or at any time, in any costume either of courtiers or civilians. Mr. Speaker, it has been the custom in Europe for many years to deride America and things American. The rulers of Europe sneered at Washington; they sneered at the Provincial Congress; they sneered at the Declaration of Independence; they sneered at our form of Government; they predicted its failure; they rejoiced at the rebellion against its authority as the expected indication of its overthrow. They sneered again at the armies which we called into the service of the country and at that glorious man who represented the head of the Government during the great struggle. This was the constant manifestation of Europe; but we have outlived their derision. Every day we have grown stronger and stronger; and the day will soon come when we shall establish not only an American policy in the matter of dress at foreign Courts, but in all that appertains to the government of the great nations of the earth, giving Europe or Asia as much cause to complain of our ideas of continental administration and international law as it is now thought they may have in regard to the change of diplomatic dress proposed by the Senate.

The time will come when they will not sneer at us, and when any chamberlain or any other officer of any foreign Government or of any crowned head of Europe, seeing any representative of this country at his receptions dressed as an American gentleman should be dressed, bearing himself as an American gentleman should bear himself, will point out that man, not as one discredited by the simplicity of his costume, but as one distinguished and honorable among the first representatives of the greatest nations; one who will speak hereafter for fifty or a hundred million people controlling the Atlantic ocean and the route to Europe on the one hand and the Pacific and the route to Asia on the other, occupying the continents between these two great seas, giving law to one hemisphere, but guiding the interests of both; a people to whom God gave liberty and the sense to preserve it. That will be the character borne by the man who truly represents the nation when it shall have fulfilled its destiny, and though bearing no insignia of rank, no title of nobility, wearing only that dress which every American wears in church, before the judicial tribunals, or in the presence of the ruler of his country.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Does it not prohibit the wearing of any uniform? Does it not repeal the act of July, 1866, this being of a later date?

Mr. BANKS. I do not understand that it repeals that act. If there be a doubt on the question I am willing to agree to an amendment. I am aware there is an interpretation which would preclude the wearing of uniforms by officers of the Army and Navy under the act of 1866, but I do not so construe it. If I thought such would be the interpretation I would myself move an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. My own impression is, without mentioning names, that this resolution has been introduced to prevent gentlemen wearing military uniforms who are not entitled to do so. I understand persons at foreign Courts have been in the habit of procuring military commissions from the Governors of States and then putting on military uniforms and wearing them as a Court dress. I think the Senate resolution is a proper one, and that it will hereafter cut off anything of the kind.

Mr. BANKS. No one will be allowed to wear a uniform unless he is entitled to wear it under act of Congress.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I hope the gentleman will let me offer the following proviso:

Provided, That this prohibition shall not apply to our consuls in the Barbary States.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that purpose. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BANKS demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LONG ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 63, to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, for military purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to take possession of that portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, Massachusetts, belonging to James T. Austin, for the purpose of erecting a fort and such other structures as may be needed for military purposes, and to pay for the same $5,000, as agreed upon; provided that this sum shall not be paid until the Attorney General of the United States is satisfied that the title has been fully transferred to the United States free from all incumbrances, and that the person receiving the money is competent to act in the premises.

Mr. ROSS. I make the point of order that this bill makes an appropriation, and must, therefore, under the rules, have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Let me make a statement. This is land which has been purchased, but the party who owns it is not able to give a deed. I have here the indorsements of the head of the Engineer Bureau and of the Secretary of War. They both ask for the passage of this bill. If the Clerk will read the indorsement of General Humphreys I think it will be a sufficient explanation.

The SPEAKER. It is certainly an appropriate bill.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. It is to be paid out of appropriations already made.

The SPEAKER. It does not so read. It says "pay for the same out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Then I will move to strike that out.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done yet.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules, and in the mean time I ask unanimous consent to have the letter of General Humphreys read.

No objection being made the letter was read, as follows:

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, March 7, 1867.

SIR: The United States district attorney for Massachusetts, to whom was referred the question of title to the land which it is desired to purchase on Long Island Head, Boston harbor, for fortification purposes, represents through his assistant, Henry D. Hyde, Esq., that it is impracticable to obtain a title by purchase to that portion of the Head owned by James T. Austin, in consequence of the condition, physical and mental, of the owner, who is very aged and believed to be so unsound of mind as to be incapable of making a valid conveyance. He therefore recommends that application be made to Congress for the passage of an act authorizing the Secretary of War to take possession of the property under the right of eminent domain, paying for the same the sum which has been agreed upon between the United States and his son, Ivers J. Austin, who is his agent; thus securing the valid title which it is otherwise impracticable to obtain during the life time of James T. Austin, the present actual owner of the property.

Should you concur in this proposition, I would suggest that the matter be brought to the attention of the chairmen of the Military Committees of the Senate and House with a view to the enactment of the necessary law. A draft of an act, which it is supposed will effect the object, is herewith.

It should be observed that the action suggested in this matter is an entirely amicable one between the parties. Mr. Ivers J. Austin, as the representative of his father, is willing to sell to the United States for what, under the circumstances, is believed to be a fair price, and the Government is willing to pay that price on securing a valid title. Such title cannot, however, be had in the usual way; and hence this proposition, which is fully concurred in by Mr. Austin's representative, and which seems to me to be without objection on the part of the Government.

Mr. Hyde will, it is understood, make such explanations to Hon. Mr. WILSON, chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate, as will put him in possession of all the information necessary to a full understanding of the case.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier General and Chief of Engineers, Major General of Volunteers.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

On the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 58, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the House adjourns now will this be the first business in the morning?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. CAKE: The petition of F. A. Herwig and 644 others, citizens of Ashland, Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress for a protective tariff and urging immediate attention to the question of protection.

By Mr. MILLER: A petition from citizens of Botsford county, Virginia, asking for the passage of a law imposing the payment of the ward bet, &c., upon active secessionists.

By Mr. SCHENCK: A petition of citizens of Portage county, Ohio, praying for the impeachment of the President of the United States.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 26, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.
The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe I shall object. There is no quorum here. It had better be read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a matter of privilege. I notice in the Boston Journal printed a few days since a statement from the correspondent of that paper personal to myself, in which it is stated that after the present Congress I intend to retire from public life. If the correspondent had stopped there I would not of course have noticed what he has said; but he goes on to say that I propose entering upon the interesting and profitable business of engaging in making wine and brandy from grapes. How he got the information that I was going so to violate the principles of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] and those he so ably advocates I do not know. I only rise to correct that part of it, because I have recently and at all times since I have been here taken a great interest in relieving that class of industry from as I thought unnecessary and improper burdens, and to say that I never had, and never intend to have, any interest in it. I need not say to the Senate that I never have had any interest in any question that comes before a body that I am a member of.

MINT LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23d instant, information relative to a proposed change in the mint laws of the United States on the subject of refining gold and silver and public policies incident thereto.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that that communication be printed and referred to the Finance Committee; and also that five hundred additional copies be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

The motion was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Department of the Interior:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1867.

SIR: In reply to a resolution adopted by the Senate this day directing the Secretary of the Interior "to report to the Senate the cause or causes for the suspension of work by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, when the said suspension took place, and what legislation is necessary, if any, to secure the early completion of the Pacific railroad from Omaha westward," I have the honor to state that this Department has not been advised of a suspension of work by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and is not prepared to recommend legislation with a view to secure the object mentioned in the resolution.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. H. BROWNING, Secretary.
Hon. B. F. WADE, President of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to refer that communication to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; and I desire to say that my information is, and I have no doubt of its correctness, that there has not been any work done upon that part of the Pacific railroad since the winter began. It is a matter of no little consequence to this country, which has appropriated so liberally for the construction of that great improvement, that any company engaged in its construction should cease operations at any season of the year. It cannot be alleged nor pleaded that because it is the season of winter therefore they cannot carry on operations. The Central Pacific railroad of California, who are now engaged in making a part of this great thoroughfare, have had during the entire winter not less than twelve thousand men engaged at a point seven thousand feet above the sea, near the summit of the Sierra Nevada mountains, where the snows fall to great depth; and they have not ceased their labor during the winter season. They have indeed conducted their operations at great increased cost to themselves; but as they have been furnished by the Government with nearly enough to enable them to build the road they feel that they would be lacking in their duty to the public and to the Government if they should show a want of energy in carrying on the work with which they are charged.

I have recently had a communication from an agent of this Government, a very responsible and intelligent gentleman, who came to Omaha on the three hundred miles of road constructed, and at the end of the road, I cannot name the station, but the western terminus, he had to remain six days before he could travel eastward to Omaha upon the three hundred miles constructed of that road because of the want of a common order of energy in removing the snow from the track, they having no sufficient apparatus for performing that comparatively easy task. For six days he was detained there; and he tells me that there has not been a particle of work done upon the road through this entire winter; that they intend to resume operations when the sun grows warm in the late spring.

Now, we are told by the Interior Department, which is charged with the superintendence and direction of this work, that there is no knowledge in that Department of these facts, if they be facts. I call the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad of this body to this state of facts: first, as alleged, that there is a total cessation of labor and has been for a length of time—

Mr. HOWARD. How long?

Mr. CONNESS. Since the winter began, and that there is not at this time, as the Secretary of the Interior reports, any knowledge in the Department as to whether they have ceased or not; and I beg his attention and the attention of his committee to this important subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose there is nothing before the Senate particularly for discussion.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a motion to refer the communication to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. POMEROY. On that question I simply desire to say that I do not wish to draw any comparison between one company and another. The company on the Pacific have undoubtedly done exceedingly well. I never heard anything against them. As to this company, all I know about them is what I have heard and seen in the papers. I understand that they have built more miles of road during the year last past than were ever built by any company anywhere in any country within the same time. They did that without having any eastern connections by which they could get their iron on to the track. They had to take it up the circuitous windings of the Missouri river in a bad state of water. Working on the surface where a road is going a valley is a very different state of facts from what it would be if they were in the mountains making deep cuts. That work can be prosecuted in the winter; but where it is mere surface work, grading through the valley of the Platte, where the entire surface is frozen, with no deep cuts to excavate, it is almost impossible to pursue it through the winter.

I only make these remarks for the sake of saying that unless there is some state of facts that I do not know of any attack upon this company would seem to me to be entirely gratuitous.

Mr. CONNESS. I have made a simple statement of facts. The Senator from Kansas calls it an attack. I do not know why he uses that language. I believe the facts I have stated are correct. If they shall not be found to be correct, I shall be most glad. But I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the law allows that company to work for three hundred miles ahead of a continuous, completed line, and it is scarcely possible that they could not find some way to exercise their energy on that road during the winter months. In addition to that, they have had from 1864, when the second Pacific railroad bill was passed, until the present winter set in, during which to deposit their iron. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to those facts.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I only take a general interest of course in this road; but the impression made on my mind, from the remarks of the Senator, is that the company are not doing their duty.

Mr. CONNESS. I think not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that the direction of that road is not in the Government; that it is in the company, and the company has its rights by its charter. Now, whether they go fast or slow according to the judgment of my honorable friend from California is not the question; and although I should have very great confidence in what might be his judgment on a state of facts of which he had accurate knowledge, I will suggest to him it is rather a serious matter on a great work like this, in which the country feels so deep a solicitude, to arraign them before the Senate, for it is hardly less than an arraignment. To say that a company that has charge of so great a work as that are neglectful of their duty is at least to advertise the country that they are not sufficiently vigilant in the prosecution of a great work in which the whole country are interested.

I do not understand that the Government of the United States have anything to do with the execution or prosecution of that work so long as the company keeps itself within the provisions of its charter. There may be a pretty broad field for criticism outside perhaps of the actual duties which devolve upon these parties in the execution of this great work, outside of the exact provisions of their charter; but I will suggest to the honorable Senator that all that was purposely left to this company by the Government of the United States. That is a province of discretion which belongs to them and does not belong to the Government, and necessarily, because in the prosecution of such a work as this the Government could not foresee exactly the circumstances under which this company might be able to press it with vigor now and to suspend its operations at some other time. The criticism of my honorable friend may in one sense be true, that they do not go as fast as he could desire and as the public expects possibly, and it may be a very severe censure on them, and yet it may be as unjust a thing as my honorable friend could say in regard to those who have the charge of that work and the great enterprise itself. I am not saying it is so, but I am simply saying that when the Senator rises here and employs language with reference to this company which is to go to the country at large, and makes a statement in which he contrasts the lethargy or inaction of this company with the commendable energy of the company on the other end, he will see that he is in danger, if they are not very much in fault, of doing that company a very great injury.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to say a word at this point?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I made the contrast to show one point, and that is that such an elevation as placed the operations of one of these companies in deep snows was not a sufficient reason for a cessation of labor. That was what I confined myself to.

Mr. HOWARD. I will inquire what is immediately before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication from the Secretary of the Interior will be read again, if it is desired.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the motion before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to refer this communication to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course I shall vote for that reference. I have but one word to say on this subject. The honorable Senator from California wishes me, as chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to take notice of the fact, which he alleges, that there has been some dereliction on the part of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the prosecution of their work during the past winter, and he alleges that there has been nothing done or very little done upon their route during or since the commencement of winter. I do not know how this may be. I have not been informed by any report or by any official communication upon the subject whether they have or have not been guilty of a stoppage of their work during the winter. I know this, however, from all sources of information which are to be relied upon, that that company have prosecuted their work with most commendable diligence and energy during the last year. I think when the facts shall be known to the country as they actually exist, there will be found no ground whatever of censure toward that company in reference to the prosecution of their work. From what I learn they have been remarkably energetic in that prosecution. In saying this I do not intend to disparage the California company, which has shown certainly an equal alacrity and an equal energy in the prosecution of their portion of the work. If the Union Pacific Railroad Company have seen fit to intermit their operations during the winter season, I think it is fair and reasonable to presume that there have been obstacles in the way which justified that intermission; and I would not be understood as casting any censure upon the company in this regard. On the other hand, I believe that the company are entitled to praise for their activity and the force and energy with which they have carried on the work.

But, sir, what can Congress do about it? The company are bound by their charter to complete the whole of this work within a given period of time, and their charter allows them to do it in their own way, subject to the restrictions contained in their charter; and I am not able to see, I confess, the propriety of attempting to launch any legislation here on the subject. If they are guilty of a breach of their charter there is a remedy well known to the law which can be enforced against them. They know it, and the world knows it; and if they commit a violation of their charter it is at their peril; so that every motive of private interest urges them to perform their work promptly, honestly, and well; and I believe from my own information that they are so doing at the present time.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it is due to the company constructing this road that I should say, in addition to what has been said by the chairman of the committee, that this company has not intermitted its work only so far forth as the character of the weather compelled it to do so. When the frosts set in in the early part of the winter, and the ground became so frozen that it became impossible for them to grade the shallow grading that was necessary to be done on the part of the work on which they were engaged, they stopped grading and putting down ties and rails; but they continued their work in the construction of machinery and in purchasing and shipping iron; and I have been informed by one of the officers of the company that they now have in possession and on the way to the line of this road enough iron to lay the track to the Laramie Plains, beyond the first bold ridge of the Rocky mountains, and are prepared to commence the work as soon as the frost is out of the ground, and put down the track at the rate of two miles a day, which will be something more than the work progressed during the last year, which has been properly said to be more rapidly than ever a railroad was constructed before. The company has built during the past year more miles of road than the law required them to build during that period. They have therefore more than fulfilled their contract.

The Senator from California, however, has truthfully said that they might have been prosecuting the work probably on the deep cuts in the Rocky mountains; but they found, in looking at the legislation recently had by Congress on this subject, that they were cut off from the subsidy that they were entitled to under the original law. Under the original law they were able to go on ahead at any distance on the line of the road and prosecute the work and draw one half of the cost of the work from the Government; but during the last Congress, whether wisely or unwisely I am not prepared to say, that charter was so modified as to render it impossible for them to do this more than three hundred miles in advance of the completed terminus of the road. I believe it is about six hundred miles from Omaha to the foot of the Rocky mountains. They have completed over three hundred miles. The additional three hundred miles will enable them perhaps to touch the base of the Rocky mountains; but if they have entered the mountains and commenced work they would have been unable to draw the subsidy which they would have been entitled to under the old bill.

I think it probable, however, that the Senator from California wishes to bring out the fact that obstructions have been thrown in the way of this company, and that there has not been intentional neglect on their part. The law requires the President of the United States to fix the point on the line of this road where the eastern base of the Rocky mountains commences, beyond which for a certain period they are allowed to draw a subsidy to the extent of $48,000 per mile, instead of $16,000, on that part of the line lying east of the eastern base of the Rocky mountains. This company applied to the Secretary of the Interior, as I have understood, in December last to have that point fixed on the line of the road by the Government, which would have enabled them to make contracts for the construction of that part of the work which they might have prosecuted during the winter months. I have been told that up to this time that point has not been fixed for some reason. Probably they have been unable to send out engineers to collect the facts necessary to enable the President to make a judicious decision. But whatever the facts may have been justifying this delay on the part of the Government, the company are not in default. They applied three months since to have that point fixed, which would have enabled them to do upon this side of the mountainous section of this road what the California company is doing on the western side of these ranges. I think when the facts shall have all been brought to the attention of the public it will be ascertained that this company has more than fulfilled its contract; it has constructed more road than it was required to construct under the law under which it was acting, and is not in default in any respect, and will not be in the future.

Mr. THAYER. I would not trouble the Senate with any remarks on this question except for the fact that this road runs through the entire State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, and in justice to the company who have had the building of this road I feel it my duty to give utterance to a few words. I was surprised yesterday when the resolution was introduced by the honorable Senator from California—not that he intended any injustice to the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly not.

Mr. THAYER. I am satisfied of that. He intends no injustice whatever; but from my knowledge of the facts I am compelled to say that even instituting an inquiry on the subject, implying that there is a neglect, does them great injustice; for I stand here to say that no improvement in ancient or modern times was ever prosecuted with such untiring energy, with such resistless force, and with means such as that company has used. Three hundred and five miles of continuous road were built last year, and they were only stopped by the power of the elements, stopped because it was beyond human energy to prosecute it during this winter. As to what has been done on the Pacific slope I have no knowledge except the information given by the Senator from California; but I have seen statements that the snow in that region is five, ten, fifteen, and twenty feet deep. If a railroad can be built there under such circumstances I yield to them the palm. It is most extraordinary. No records will present a like fact.

Now, sir, this has been the most remarkable winter in the West that that distinguished personage, "the oldest inhabitant," has had any knowledge of. There have been snows such as have never fallen before. They have stopped the progress of all works. But while this company have been stopped they have not been idle. They have been concentrating at the end of this three hundred miles of road an immense amount of material which they are now about to use. They have been getting iron out there in immense quantities, and engines, and all the paraphernalia of a railroad, just as fast as the means of communication have enabled them to do. When the navigation closed on the Missouri river they were stopped for a while from getting any further material out there. The Northwestern railroad across the State of Iowa was not completed until the latter part of January, I believe. Since that has been completed they have exhausted all the means at their command in forwarding materials to be used when the spring opens.

If I heard the Senator correctly, he stated that a traveler reaching Omaha was detained a week before he could go on East. Was that correct?

Mr. CONNESS. That was at the western terminus before he could travel to Omaha—at the western end of the three hundred miles.

Mr. THAYER. How long was he detained?

Mr. CONNESS. One week.

Mr. THAYER. I do not doubt that, for such an immense body of snow has fallen on the line of that road that there was not means enough at the command of the company to open it. So it has been in Iowa. I recollect when the New York Central and railroads in New England were blocked up three days this winter at different times. Trains were snowed up within a few miles of Albany, kept over night, I believe six hours, and nobody thought the New York Central Railroad Company had lacked in energy or shown bad management. It was simply because the elements have been against human energy, and human energy could not overcome them at once. I can tell the honorable Senator from California that this company are using all the means at their command and pushing forward with extraordinary energy to construct their road. I hope he will withdraw his motion.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, what is proposed by me, namely, to refer the communication of the Secretary of the Interior to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, means nothing but that that committee may get the facts, and if those facts go to the credit of that company no one will be more glad than I. The only interest I have in this matter is the interest of the entire country that all the energy which can be applied shall be applied to the construction of this great work. It is due to myself as well as due to the company to say that I have no feelings toward them but a pride in their organization and in what they have done; but I believe, from the facts which have come to my mind, that they might have done still more, and the country requires it.

Mr. TIPTON. I wish simply to say, in conjunction with the remarks that have been made by the Senator from Iowa and by my colleague, that it is not becoming that I should be silent on this occasion when I have been impressed, as other men have been, with the wonderful energy and the indefatigable perseverance of those having control of the Union Pacific railroad; and when I know that whatever they have done, and whatever they will do, will be amply vindicated at all times by the facts of the case. And yet I am not quite satisfied that there should be a reference of this matter. I am not quite willing to imply that it is at all possible that any dereliction should be ascertained in regard to that company of such great fidelity and wonderful perseverance. I would therefore move, whether I be in order or out of order, that the document and the subject lie upon the table.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that this communication lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) for the relief of George W. Ashburn was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation for improving the harbor at the mouth of the Menomonee river, between the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Mrs. Ann Dycher, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CLAIMS OF NORTHERN CREDITORS.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) relative to claims of certain northern creditors, report it back with amendments, and recommend its passage; and as it has passed the House of Representatives, and must go back with the amendments, and it is important that there should be action at the present session, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that the congress of the confederate States ordered the sequestration and confiscation of all the debts due from inhabitants of the southern States to their creditors residing in the loyal States; and that there was paid to the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, prior to the 1st day of May, 1862, a sum exceeding half a million dollars, the proceeds of such confiscation of northern credits, of which there remained to the credit of the confederate State receivers in such bank the sum of $219,090 94 only on the 1st day of May, at the time of the occupation of the city of New Orleans by the forces of the United States, which sum, by the order of the general then commanding the department of the Gulf, was seized for the benefit of the northern creditors whose debts had been thus confiscated, and was by him sent to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to be by him held in trust for the benefit of those northern creditors; and owing to a doubt entertained by the Secretary of the Treasury as to his legal authority to distribute said sum of $219,090 94 among the creditors to whom it belongs, and to determine the rights of each to his portion thereof, the money has lain thus undisturbed in the Treasury since July, 1862, to the great injury and detriment of the just and lawful owners thereof, although they have made many applications to have the same. The resolution, therefore, proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a commission of three persons, one of whom shall be learned in the law, to hear and determine the various claims of the parties who are entitled to said sum of $219,090 94, ratably among the persons who shall present their claims and be entitled thereto, to an amount not exceeding the claim of each when confiscated, with interest thereon; but any claim which shall not be presented within three months after public notice of a meeting of commissioners to receive such claim shall not be allowed or paid by order of the commissioners; and the cost of the commission is to be paid out of the money.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "law" in line five and inserting:

To take and report to Congress evidence in support of the claims of the several parties whose debts were sequestrated and contributed to produce said sum of $178,897 50, together with the date at which such debts were contracted, and the interest accrued thereon to the date of such report: Provided, That said commission shall give public notice of the time and place at which such claims shall be presented by advertising the same in some newspaper published in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, for three months; and no claim shall be considered unless it shall be presented at or before the time so advertised: And provided further, That the cost of said commission shall be paid out of said money.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in the preamble "$219,090 94" in two places and insert "$178,897 50."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the joint resolution read a third time. The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 115) to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government, by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the bill be printed, and lie on the table. I should like to call up this bill for consideration. It is a very important bill, intended to cut the Gordian knot of the suffrage question throughout the whole country.

The motion was agreed to.

LINCOLN MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia have directed me to report back the bill (S. No. 112) to incorporate the Lincoln Monument Association, and recommend its passage; and I should like to have it acted on now. It will occupy but a moment. I suppose no Senator will object to its passage.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to constitute Alexander W. Randall, James Harlan, Alexander Ramsey, Nathaniel P. Banks, Sidney Perham, John Conness, John T. Wilson, Godlove S. Orth, Delos R. Ashley, Halbert E. Paine, Charles O'Neill, Burt Van Horn, John F. Driggs, Frederick E. Woodbridge, Jacob Benton, John Hill, Shelby M. Cullom, Thomas A. Jenckes, Orin S. Ferry, N. B. Smithers, Francis Thomas, Samuel McKee, Horace Maynard, John F. Benjamin, Rufus Mallory, Sidney Clarke, Daniel Polsley, Walter A. Burleigh, John Taffe, and their successors, a body-corporate in the District of Columbia, by the name of the Lincoln Monument Association, for the purpose of erecting a monument in the city of Washington, commemorative of the great charter of emancipation and universal liberty in America.

Mr. WILLEY. I suggest whether there ought not to be some provision made for the security of the funds which may come into the hands of this corporation. To test the sense of the Senate on the subject I move to amend the bill by adding at the close of the fifth section these words:

The treasurer shall execute a bond, in such penalty as may be required, conditioned for the safe-keeping of the funds of the corporation which may come into his hands, and for the faithful discharge of the duties required of him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

COLORADO TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE.

Mr. NYE. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 114, amendatory of the act establishing the Territory of Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It becomes the duty of the Chair at this time to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the resolution in regard to adjournment.

Mr. NYE. I move to lay that aside informally for the purpose of taking up the bill to which I have referred. It is important that the bill should pass.

Mr. POMEROY. The unfinished business cannot be laid aside informally by a motion. It can be laid aside by unanimous consent. If laid aside by a motion, it is laid aside for the day.

Mr. NYE. Well, let it be laid aside by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none; and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 114) amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POMEROY. It seems to me that it will produce difficulty if we give the members of the Legislature in this Territory more per day than we give in other Territories. I think that in the Territories which we have organized we have uniformly allowed the members of the Legislature the same amount of compensation. Now, we propose to give the members of the Legislature of Colorado Territory six dollars a day. We shall have to do it in all the other organized Territories if we do it in this case. There are other mountain Territories beside Colorado, where the expenses are very great, and in these Territories I presume six dollars a day is not too much; but I suggest that the bill as it stands is a discrimination against the other organized Territories. If they need more, the territorial Legislature can give them any additional amount they can raise.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Kansas is laboring under quite a mistake. Before the last Congress the uniform rate of pay to members of territorial Legislatures was three dollars a day, and their sessions were annual. A year ago or more a law was passed in regard to the Territory of Washington, and at the last session a similar one in regard to the Territory of Montana, making the sessions biennial, and giving the members six dollars a day, so that this bill conforms precisely to, and is in fact a copy of, the bills in regard to Montana and Washington Territories. One trouble is that my friend has not quite kept pace with the march of the Territories. Any person who has lived in these mountain Territories knows very well that three dollars a day is a mere nothing. The expenses of the government in fact are precisely the same as they were before; the bill makes no difference in that regard. It is only to make this Territory harmonious and uniform with the others. I trust the Senator from Kansas will be satisfied with this explanation and let this bill pass, so that Colorado shall be put on the same footing with the other Territories.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not know that we had commenced on the line of giving six dollars a day.

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir; and we have made their sessions biennial.

Mr. POMEROY. If we have already entered on this line of increasing the pay in two or three Territories heretofore organized I will say no more about it. I ought to have made the objection when the first Territory was being arranged under this rule.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe there is a limitation in the existing law in regard to this Territory upon the duration of the sessions of the legislative body. Their sessions are confined to a period of forty days. If they are to meet biennially instead of annually it strikes me that limitation ought to be removed, and the Senate ought to adopt an amendment providing that the session should not last, say more than sixty days, or some period somewhat longer than the present limitation.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator from Pennsylvania had resided in any of these Territories he would have ascertained before this that a forty days' session, if the Legislature did not meet oftener than once in four years, would be enough. If anything is wrong about it, it is that the time is too long. The length of the session of the territorial Legislature remains unaltered in the bills to which I have referred in regard to the other Territories. I think forty days is a sufficient time to do all the legislation necessary. I hope, therefore, that suggestion will not be heeded.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE SCRIP.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to take up House joint resolution No. 21. It is a joint resolution which has already been passed by the other House and which it is important that we should pass before we adjourn. The agricultural college bill that we passed provided for the issue of a certain quantity of land scrip to the various States. The States in rebellion have not until recently applied for any scrip with the exception of the State of Tennessee, which has already been provided for by Congress. The other States which were lately in rebellion have now applied, and one or two States without having been reorganized according to the provisions of our law are pressing upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office the issuing of this scrip to them. We think they are not yet in a sufficiently organized state to receive agricultural college scrip, and this joint resolution is simply to restrain the issue of scrip to those States until they shall be represented in Congress and organized under the system of organization provided by Congress. That is all there is in the joint resolution. It is very important that the officers should be restrained from issuing agricultural college scrip to these States before they are organized under the act of Congress. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 21) relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to States lately in rebellion.

It is recited in the preamble that on the 3d day of April, 1866, by the authority and direction of the President of the United States, agricultural college scrip, covering nearly two hundred and seventy thousand acres, was issued and delivered to the State of North Carolina under the act of Congress of July 5, 1862, providing for agricultural colleges; and that by the same authority the General Land Office is now preparing to issue scrip in like manner to the States of Virginia, Georgia, and Mississippi; and that this action of the President takes for granted that those States are restored to their proper constitutional relation to the Union, and are to be recognized in all respects as entitled to the rights of the other States of the Union, which questions Congress alone can rightfully determine. It therefore proposes to prohibit the further issue or delivery of such scrip to any of the States lately in rebellion against the United States, except the State of Tennessee, or the acceptance of such scrip or of any heretofore issued by the registers or receivers of any of the land offices of the States named, until they shall be fully restored to their rights as States by Congress.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to take this occasion to make a statement in regard to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the various States. I think that measure on the part of Congress was extremely unwise. I was charged by the State of Indiana, in connection with a board of trustees created for that purpose, with the sale of the scrip delivered to that State for the purpose of erecting an agricultural college. The law provided that in a State where there was no public land subject to entry at $1 25 per acre, scrip should be issued in lieu of land. Then the law further provided that the States themselves could not locate this scrip, but that they must sell it. Ohio, for example, got scrip calling for nearly six hundred thousand acres of land, and Indiana got scrip calling for three hundred and ninety thousand acres of land, and so all the other States according to the number of their representatives in Congress. What has been the practical effect of it? The States could not locate it themselves, but they were required to sell it. The scrip was thrown upon the market; each State became a competitor with the other States, and all of them were competing with the General Government. The result was that the scrip fell in the market from eighty-seven to fifty cents an acre, and when I offered the Indiana scrip for sale no more than fifty cents an acre could be obtained for it. Acting for the State of Indiana, I refused to sell it and very much preferred to return the scrip to the United States. The whole scheme of creating agricultural colleges by the issue of this scrip is a failure. The States have sold their scrip at from fifty to sixty cents an acre, not realizing enough from it in any case to carry out the grand purpose contemplated by Congress. The Government can sell no land at $1 25 an acre, because speculators buy up the scrip, and of course can sell it to those who wish to buy land at less than the Government price of the land. The States are realizing but a small fund from it, insufficient to build these colleges, and the purpose for which the grant was made is a failure.

I trust no more scrip will ever be issued; and I believe in regard to those States who have not already sold their scrip that some arrangement ought to be made between them and the General Government in regard to it. It would have been far wiser to donate to the States so much money for that purpose and let the Government keep the land and sell it at $1 25 per acre, rather than to have thirty States in the market competing with each other; and all with the General Government, and selling their scrip for what they can get for it. If you will look to the reports of your land sales you will find that not one acre out of a thousand is bought from the Government direct at $1 25 per acre and paid for into the Treasury, when men can enter it with this land scrip, which they can buy at fifty or sixty or seventy cents an acre. The States have to sell it in large quantities to speculators. They cannot retail it. Then the men who buy it enter it in large quantities or sell it for what they can get. The whole scheme therefore has failed; and I think so far from any more of this scrip being issued the law ought to be repealed as to all the States to which the scrip has not yet been issued, and some provision should be made as a substitute for it.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to inquire of the honorable Senator from Kansas whether this resolution relates to all the States or only to the rebel States?

Mr. POMEROY. This resolution is only to restrain the issuing of scrip to the States lately in rebellion until they shall have been restored to their relations to the Union and recognized by Congress. Then they are to have the scrip the same as the other States have had it already.

Mr. HOWARD. I should be well satisfied with that. I think the necessity for such a measure is very strong.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer this amendment, to come in as a proviso at the end of the joint resolution:

Provided, That not more than five sections of agricultural college scrip heretofore or hereafter issued shall be located in one township.

In support of this amendment I desire to say that while this agricultural college scrip has been of no particular advantage to the non-land-holding States, it has been a great curse to the land States of the West. As the honorable Senator from Indiana has said, this scrip prevents the Government's selling land, because the scrip can be bought in the market at fifty, sixty, or seventy cents an acre, while the Government price of land is $1 25. The result is that large quantities of it are bought up by speculators, and fifty or sixty or one hundred thousand acres of beautiful lands in the West are entered in a body by those persons who can afford to lay out of their money ten or fifteen years, and the result is to keep the country without settlers and destroy the settlement and progress of the States of the West. The whole of this agricultural college scrip business is nothing but a curse; it has done no good; it has done and will inevitably do a great deal of harm hereafter. I hope the Senate will at least adopt this amendment, so that if we cannot now absorb or take back this scrip, we may at least regulate its entry in such a manner as to produce less mischief, by confining the location to five or six sections in one township, thus distributing it over the whole country, instead of closing up a county, or two or three counties, against settlement. I hope that out of consideration to the people on the frontier the Senate will adopt this amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will not move that amendment on this bill. In the first place, it is not germane to the bill. The bill is to restrain the issuing of scrip to States that have lately been in rebellion until their State organizations shall have been recognized by Congress.

Mr. YATES. I know something about the operations in this scrip.

Mr. POMEROY. But that question is not in this bill.

Mr. YATES. But I wish to refer to the fact that it is below par in the market, and to suggest that in my judgment the reason for that is because it cannot be entered in small subdivisions. An individual desiring to enter forty or eighty acres of land cannot do it with this scrip.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be used to enter a quarter section.

Mr. YATES. I think the great reason why it is below par is because it cannot be used in entering the smaller subdivisions. There can be no other reason why it should be lower in the market than land warrants. If the Senator from Kansas would offer an amendment to allow the scrip to be used in entering smaller subdivisions than a quarter section, it seems to me the result would be to appreciate the price of this scrip in the market to the value of land warrants.

Mr. POMEROY. There could be no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Illinois, except that it cannot properly be offered to this bill. This is to restrain the officers of the land department from issuing this scrip to States that have been in rebellion, and whose governments are not recognized by Congress. Whenever the bill shall be before Congress to modify the agricultural college law, it may be well so to modify it as to provide that the scrip shall be issued in quarter sections and half quarters. I should have no objection to that, but think it would be an improvement. But this bill having already passed the House of Representatives, and scrip being now ready for issue to the States of Virginia, Georgia, and Mississippi, it was deemed by those familiar with the subject wisest to restrain that issue until their State governments are restored. This measure, if it be passed at all, must I suppose be passed to-day; and it is better not to send it back to the other House with an amendment. I hope no amendment will be adopted which will make it necessary to send the bill back to the House of Representatives; because in that way we may fail in securing what we want. However good any amendments may be in themselves, I hope they will not be placed on this bill, because they are not applicable.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the evil were not so great and crying a one I should not press my amendment at this time; but I hope the Senate will gratify me and gratify the people I represent, as well as other far western States, by adopting this amendment at this time.

In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, I will say that the country might have been relieved in a large measure from the unfavorable operation of this scrip if the Committee on Public Lands had agreed to a bill which I introduced at the opening of the session and had referred to them, making this scrip useful to preëmptors by allowing them to pay for their preëmptions with it. The committee thought otherwise, and refused to report in favor of the bill. Of course one incident of such legislation as that would have been to increase the price of scrip. That was not my motive in introducing the bill, though of course it would have followed as a necessary incident. My desire was to give a healthful flow to the scrip, to let the preëmptors pay for their preëmptions with it, instead of paying, as they now do, either in land warrants or in money. It seems to me there could have been no reasonable objection to allowing them to buy this scrip and pay for their preëmptions with it; and the result of that policy would have been to secure to the country a settler for each piece of scrip. That committee, however, have not viewed that proposition in the light in which I do. If they had reported that bill favorably, and the Senate had passed it, we should have been relieved in a great measure from the oppressive effects of the legislation of Congress under which this scrip was issued. As it is, I hope the Senate will extend the slight relief which this amendment which I have offered will afford.

Mr. MORTON. My objection to this bill is that it authorizes the issue of scrip when those States shall have been reconstructed.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the law now.

Mr. MORTON. I insist that not another acre of scrip shall be issued. Let me state one fact in connection with the sale of this scrip, to show the operation of the law. One house in Detroit purchased scrip to the amount of nine hundred thousand acres, and bought it at fifty, fifty-two, and fifty-five cents an acre. It is the best arrangement that has ever been made for land speculators. The law prohibits the States from locating the scrip, because that would create a monopoly; but it permits persons to purchase scrip for fifty cents an acre or whatever they can buy it for, and locate it and hold the lands. One man has purchased scrip and located it now to the amount of ninety thousand acres, which cost him about fifty cents per acre. The Government could have sold that land at $1 25 per acre; but of course the Government can sell no lands while persons can buy scrip at fifty cents an acre. It would have been much better for the Government to have given to each State a dollar instead of each acre of land, and then to have sold the land at $1 25 per acre. The States would have realized double the amount of money, and the Government would have done better in the end. In its practical operation there never was, in my opinion, a more unwise measure, and as this bill permits the reconstructed States to obtain scrip, I think it ought to be amended in that respect.

Mr. HOWE. I have only a single word to remark, and that is to express my gratification at what has just been said by the Senator from Indiana, in which he is substantially corroborated by the Senator from Minnesota. I happened to be here at the time the bill passed making this provision for agricultural colleges, and I felt myself called upon to protest against it. I thought it was one of the heaviest blows which had been struck at the settlement of the new States. I had had occasion to know something of the effects of land monopolies upon those States. I remember to have said in the course of that debate that I was entirely willing to set aside to the use of each of the States the proceeds of a quantity of land equal to that mentioned in the bill; but I did think that we ought to insist upon still retaining in the Government the disposition of the lands; but that policy was not observed. I wish the Senator from Indiana had been here at that time to have added the weight of his counsel to my own. I think the West would have been saved from a very great injury, which has already been inflicted upon it through the operations of that bill. What can be done hereafter to relieve against these injuries I do not know. I am not sure that we ought to do anything now to embarrass the passage of the bill before us. I agree with the Committee on Public Lands that this bill ought to pass, and ought to pass at once; and anxious as I am to see such a provision adopted as that proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, confident as I am that it will do something to relieve the western States from the injurious operations of the former law, yet I think we had better postpone action than to put it upon the bill now before the Senate. Every one knows, or at least every one hopes, or at least I hope, that we are near the hour of adjournment. To put this amendment or any other on the bill and necessitate the sending of it back to the House of Representatives may endanger its final passage; and I think it very important that this bill should become a law before we adjourn.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the policy of the original bill will not enter into the discussion of the question of the passage of this bill. This is not a question whether the law was a good one or a bad one. It is a law, and the States have availed themselves of it. The States in rebellion will, I hope, be in a condition to avail themselves of it at some time. I think they are not in that condition now, and this is merely a proposition to restrain the issue of scrip to them until they are restored. The House of Representatives acted promptly on information being furnished them from the Land Office, and I think it important that the Senate should also act promptly. I hope any amendment not germane to the measure, like the one proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, will not be adopted. Its only tendency will be to defeat a measure which it is very important should be passed at this session.

Mr. RAMSEY. The amendment is entirely germane. It is in reference to agricultural college scrip. The joint resolution is to restrain the issue of scrip to certain States. My amendment is to restrain the location of it. Certainly the House of Representatives could act on the amendment, and doubtless would act favorably in fifteen minutes if it were sent to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BANKRUPT LAW.

On motion of Mr. SPRAGUE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 106) fixing the time at which the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, shall go into effect.

Mr. SPRAGUE. As I understand it, those who favor the bankrupt law, as well as those who are in opposition to it, are in favor of the bill which is now under consideration. I desire, however, to amend the bill by striking out the words "June next" and inserting "January, 1868;" and on this amendment I desire to say a few words.

The bankrupt law which this bill is intended to perfect releases those who have heretofore become bankrupt and are disabled from prosecuting the business of life. It refers also to those who are now occupied in the business of life. The former class desire it to go into operation immediately; the other class desire, if it must go into effect, that there shall be a future time fixed for it, so that they can regulate their business arrangements in conformity to the law. When the law was passed it was thought by those who advocated it that there was a future time specified when it was to take effect; but on a close inspection of the law since its passage it has been found that it goes into effect immediately upon its passage, but that no proceedings can be instituted under it until the 1st of June. The business men of the country have been anxiously waiting to know when it went into operation. Their notes become due, and the settlement of their business and the prosecution of their business is of every-day occurrence. That cannot stop; something must be done; and they must know when they are to conform to the regulations established by Congress.

I do not mean by what I now say to indicate any opposition to a bankrupt law. I am inclined in some respects to favor such a measure. I believe that it is proper that a man engaged in business in Iowa should have security in some general regulations and laws so that his operations shall be protected to the same extent of a man in business in Rhode Island; that a man engaged in one State shall not receive favor at the hands of the local Legislature detrimental to those engaged in business in another State.

We have had in this country heretofore two experiments of a bankrupt law, and both failed; both were imperfect. They failed because those engaged in business and who were to be affected by the operations of the law were not sufficiently educated in its workings and its machinery. They believed that everything that was of disadvantage to them was to be attributed to the operations of the law. To some extent they were right; but in a great degree they were wrong. I believe that it is important for the interests of the trade of this country that there shall be some general regulation upon which all business engagements shall be conducted and regulated. I am disinclined, and shall ever be disinclined, to favor the repeal of this law, if there is any chance for its remaining a permanent institution; but it must be plain to every Senator that if the business world believes that all the ill effects that may occur from its passage may be attributed to this law they will unite with those who would be relieved of their debts and those who will be hereafter petitioning for a bankrupt law to be released from their creditors; and those two uniting will in the end as certainly defeat the measure as that you have already passed it.

If you can give time whereby the business interests of this country can conform their operations to this law and thoroughly understand it, my word for it, it will go into effect satisfactorily to all the interests that are affected by it; but if it is forced upon them at a period when all the inequalities and irregularities growing out of the business connections of the past five years are producing their effect, if all these difficulties are to be thrust into this one year for a settlement, and all the disadvantages which the speculations and the losses and the failures in business operations are concentrated in this one year, the bankrupt law will be charged with all those disadvantages, and they will attribute them all to the law; and the troubles growing out of difficulties of the past will be saddled upon it. My judgment is that if a future day be fixed for its operation, so that the business men of the country can concentrate their minds upon it, when all the anxieties and cares which are now upon them in the settlement of the past have been done away with, they will look to the law as a blessing rather than as they now do, as a curse.

It is known to every man who is engaged in the business of life, mercantile or commercial, that it is necessary at times for those who have made bad trades, who have been unfortunate in business, who have accumulated stocks that are unsalable, to have some accommodation; and instead of surrendering to the weight which is upon them: they go to those who they believe are able to sustain them, they approach those who they think will be able to sustain them, and they obtain loans on honor temporarily. Under the operations of this law, however, no one will be asked for such a favor, and none can grant it. If business had been conducted in accordance with the law, if it had been on your statute-book in such a way as to give notice of its operations, nobody would complain; but as it now stands it is to apply to past transactions; and the settlement of difficulties incident to your war, the accumulation of five or six years of the ups and downs of trade, is to be concentrated in this year. All that the business community ask is that the custom which has been established from time immemorial in the arrangement and settlement of their business affairs, in rendering them able to sustain themselves, shall be now permitted to them. It seems to me to be a reasonable request. I therefore advocate it as one in sympathy, growing every day, with the law. I believe it will tend to make it more permanent, to make it more of a fixture, if you permit them to educate themselves to it, and make it apply in the future rather than in the present.

I have proposed to fix the 1st day of January as the day for the taking effect of the law. I have named that day because it is well known to all that on that day partnerships are closed, new concerns are established, and old ones are dissolved, and accounts for the year are then settled. It seems to me that a law having such a great influence upon the business interests of the country should, instead of being thrust upon them in the midst of trials and anxieties heretofore unknown to the business men of the country, be held before them in the distance, so that they should be able to conform their future transactions to it. I do not believe its immediate operation is insisted on by those who are specially to be favored by it, those who are now under disabilities, whose debts render them unable to assume the business of life. I do not believe that they would go so far as to require its operation to prejudice those who are now doing the business of the country, who are in good credit and good standing, by insisting upon themselves being allowed now to take the benefit of the law at once, instead of granting a short season to those already in business to shape their affairs in conformity to the law.

I believe there is no class of people in this world who have grown from youth to manhood, and from manhood to old age, so quickly as the business men of the country. I believe the wrinkles representing age and care have come upon no set of men in so short a period as upon those who have been engaged in the business operations of the country during the past five years. They believe that they may be relieved of an additional care and of an additional anxiety by fixing a distant period when this law shall go into effect, and danger to a very great extent in that way may be avoided.

With these remarks I leave the matter with the Senate, and I trust they will unite with me in giving to those who are now weighed down with cares and anxieties a chance to conform their operations to the new system provided by this law by making it take effect on the 1st of January next.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I confess to a great objection to any action by this Congress in reference to the bankrupt act, and most especially do I object to a bill being brought in here and pressed through the Senate without a reference to any committee to investigate what its character is and what its effect is to be upon the bankrupt law. The bankrupt act recently passed has probably gone through a severer scrutiny than any statute that has ever been put upon the statute-books of this nation. It has been the result of the accumulated labors of many minds for many years; it has gone through committees through both Houses, and I say that it is utterly impossible, at least I think it is so, that any Senator shall be able to tell the full scope and effect of the bill which is now before the Senate. I am afraid of it; I am afraid that it has a reach and an operation which we do not understand, and for this reason I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was opposed, Mr. President, to the passage of the bankrupt law, and voted against it; and when the subject of postponing its operation was incidentally mentioned to me, I was inclined to favor it; but on further consideration, my judgment is that if the bankrupt bill is to have the effect of law it should go into operation without much delay. Suppose that the amendment which is proposed should be adopted by Congress, what then will be the effect? Persons who are in debt at this time, and who are disposed to be dishonest, knowing that on the 1st day of next January they can avail themselves of the benefits of the bankrupt law, will prepare themselves, by disposing of their property, by converting their real estate into money, and making other arrangements to be enabled to say at the time they proceed under the bankrupt law, that they have no assets for their creditors; and they will not, as a general rule, have any available assets for their creditors at that time. Here is a notice given to every dishonest debtor in the United States to prepare to take the benefit of the bankrupt law on the 1st day of January next, and every man knows that if a person who is in debt is so disposed he can cover up his property, or convert it from one kind to another, so as to entirely defeat his creditors; whereas if the law was to take effect at this time he would have no such opportunity.

That is one objection which I have to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island. Another is that, in my judgment, it will operate with great hardship upon debtors. Suppose a man is now in debt, and it is understood that he can take the benefit of the bankrupt law on the 1st day of next January, and not before, the consequence will be that every creditor will in the mean time proceed with all possible dispatch to collect his debt; every creditor will commence a suit, and if there be any reason whatever, attachments will be issued, and there will be a race among the creditors to convert the property of the debtor into means for the payment of his debts. It amounts to an invitation to the creditors of the country to persecute the debtors between this time and the 1st day of January; and every man who has a claim, apprehensive that on the 1st day of January the debtor, who may be in failing circumstances, will avail himself of the benefit of the law, will proceed to collect that claim, will bring a suit, recover judgment, accumulate costs; and so the debtors of the country will be, as it seems to me, very greatly embarrassed, and this law, which its friends say is intended as a benefit to the debtors of the country, will, in fact, prove a very great burden and a very great injury to them, and the debtors of the country will, before the 1st day of next January, be completely crushed, stripped of all their property by proceedings that may be commenced for the recovery of their debts.

For these two reasons, and others which might be suggested, it seems to me that it is very unwise to postpone the operation of the law until that time. I should be satisfied to vote for the repeal of the law. I believe it is an unjust law, and in some respects unconstitutional; but if there is to be a bankrupt law, and so Congress has decided, it seems to me the sooner it can take effect the better for the entire country.

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill as it is proposed, merely carries into effect precisely what all the Senate, I suppose, thought was the bankrupt bill when it was passed. I suppose everybody thought the act went into effect on the 1st of June. I did certainly. This bill merely proposes that it shall go into effect on the 1st of June.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The 1st of January, I understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is an amendment which my colleague has moved. I am speaking of the bill as it was originally introduced, and I hope my colleague will withdraw that amendment, because I do not think it meets the assent of the Senate. I think, myself, it would be an improvement to postpone the operation of the law for six or eight months, so as to give the country a chance to adapt itself to it; but still I do not think that is the temper of the Senate, and I do not see any use in undertaking to persuade the Senate to pass what they are not disposed to pass. The original bill, as we all understood, provided that the act should go into effect on the 1st of June. I think that was the universal understanding when the bill was passed. I may be permitted to state that the very eminent lawyer who had charge of it in this body, and who is not now a member of the Senate, fully concurs in this bill as not only eminently just and proper in itself, but as carrying out what was the intention of the law. I think the fiftieth section of the law, as drawn, was an inadvertence. I would not presume at this period of the session to introduce a bill to alter the effect of a law passed with so much care and examination as the bankrupt law; but this bill is really to carry into effect what was the intention of the Senate in passing the law originally. I think if my colleague will withdraw his amendment the Senate will be likely to assent to the passage of the bill as originally proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was done by Congress in passing the bankrupt act as far as respects the objection now taken to its operation has, I think, been done by every State in the Union in passing laws of a similar character, and by the Congresses who passed the antecedent bankrupt acts, and by the English Parliament. This act was pending in the Legislature for many weeks and months before it became a law. The public, therefore, were advised that in all probability a law of this description would be passed, and upon the hypothesis or upon the theory that there might be in the intermediate time between the introduction of the bill and its receiving the sanction of Congress, conveyances made to defeat the object of the bankrupt act, the law provides that all such conveyances after an act of bankruptcy or insolvency was in fact committed, executed, four months before the party should seek to be declared a bankrupt, should be considered as void. That is done by the thirty-fifth section of the act.

Now, my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] tells us—I have no doubt that was his impression—that if he recollects correctly what was stated by the member of the committee who had the bill in charge, it was supposed by him that the law was to have no operation at all until the 1st of June; in other words, that the bill was not to be a law for any purpose until the 1st of June, and then to be a law for all purposes. If that had been the case, or if we say now that that is to be the case by so providing, how will that get clear of the supposed injustice of which the honorable member complains? The thirty-fifth section will still remain; and if a party applies to become a bankrupt, or is involuntarily driven into bankruptcy under the authority of the act, all transfers made after he became in fact insolvent, though before the law was passed, if they were committed within a period of four months antecedent to the 1st of June, would fall within the prohibition of that section and be void.

I do not know what has been done in Rhode Island, nor do I know what has been done in any of the States, but I can very well imagine that the moment it was suggested that a law of this kind would pass creditors commenced a race to secure themselves, and in anticipation of that event preferences were made. Some are secured by those conveyances, and some will be without security; there will be no equal distribution of the assets. The law goes upon the theory, right I think morally as well as otherwise, that in the case of an insolvency in fact there should be in justice an equal distribution of all the assets. Now, the operation of what I understand from the honorable members from Rhode Island of the manner of doing business in that State is to do great injustice to some creditors. A manufacturing company there gets into difficulty, or a merchant who has been largely engaged in trade gets into a difficulty. He owes $1,000,000 say. The public know nothing of his trouble. My friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] or some one else who is able to relieve him, comes forward and advances him say $300,000 to enable him to go through the crisis in which he is placed. He does not go through; but the mere fact that he is permitted to go on and is enabled to go on because of the aid furnished him by some friend gives him a credit in the community to which, if his actual condition were known, he would not be entitled. But finally he fails, and what then is the result? It will be found, taking the hypothesis which I have just stated, that my friend from Rhode Island is secured his $300,000, and when the assets of the bankrupt come to be disposed of there is nothing left for the other creditors; the men who have trusted him elsewhere, who have supposed that his real condition was that of prosperity, judging only from the outside, seeing that he was getting on, knowing nothing of his operations, when the result becomes known are left without a dollar. Now, if it be right, as I think it is, that in the event of an actual bankruptcy the assets should be distributed equally, the bankrupt ought not to be allowed to refuse to do it by providing for some preferred creditors, leaving all the rest to lose everything which he may owe them. Then it is right in the Legislature to whom jurisdiction over the subject is given to guard against it by saying that he may be forced into bankruptcy; or if he applies for a discharge under the bankrupt act it is to be granted to him in either case only upon the condition that he has acted in accordance with the equitable rule which demands an equal distribution of his assets; and in order to make that rule effective in the particular case it is necessary to provide that all conveyances in conflict with that rule shall be considered void, and the whole of the estate is to go into the hands of the assignees of the bankrupt for the benefit of his creditors.

I know that where it is understood at the time these advances were made to him to enable him to go on it appears to be right that the party who makes the advance, if the contingency of declared insolvency actually occurs, should be secured; but if you allow that to be done, the result is that while one man is saved from loss the other creditors are ruined. The man thus assisted goes on and contracts debts; he pays the debts that are pressing upon him at the time, because he is able to pay them out of the $300,000 which I suppose him to have received from a friend; he thereby gets credit and contracts other debts, and those debts contracted by him with others when the time comes that he is called on to pay them are all lost.

Mr. ANTHONY. You are supposing him to be dishonest.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I am not supposing him to be dishonest. He thinks he can go on; the man who advances the money thinks he can go on; but in nine times out of ten it is much better for him to stop the first time that he is advised that he is in a situation where he cannot go on without help. There may be cases, of course, of some sudden crisis, which may be at an end in a month or two; but the general result is that he who is largely involved in business, and who seeks aid, is sure in the end, as a general rule, to be insolvent, and then all his intervening creditors lose their money, while the preferred creditor is no loser. He may have acted in good faith; but he has enabled the debtor to get a continuing credit by means of his advances, and therefore others have been induced to become his debtors. There would be no objection to that, provided when the advance was made the party to whom it was made executed a mortgage and put it on the record; but that is not done in these cases. I hope my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] will permit me to illustrate it by referring to himself. Suppose he received $400,000 from a friend to go on in the business in which he might be engaged. I could not tell that it was not all his money. I could not tell that he owed it to anybody. If at the time he borrowed it he executed a mortgage, and the mortgage was recorded, then I and everybody else would have the means of ascertaining whether he was worth $400,000 or whether it belonged to somebody else. That is not done, however; and it is not done for the very reason that if it was done it would defeat, in a great measure, the object of obtaining the advance. He could not get the credit.

I rose to say thus much, and then to add that I very much doubt whether if the proposed amendatory bill be passed it will accomplish the object aimed at. It provides that the act is to go into effect on some subsequent day, instead of the day of the passage of the act; but the proviso at the close is—

That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith prior to the taking effect of this act.

I should be apprehensive, and I tell the friends of the bill, that I think the courts would hold that an assignment or conveyance made by a man who was known to be in a state of bankruptcy was not made in good faith, and would not be protected by the proviso. But that is merely a criticism on the bill. To postpone the time of the operation of the act until the 1st of January would, in my judgment, be virtually a defeat of the law altogether. The effect of that might be to raise a clamor in the country without knowing what the object of the bill was; whether it was a wholesome or a deleterious one; a clamor might be raised which might induce Congress to repeal the law altogether before it had by experiment been proved to be either a good or a bad law. If the friends of the proposed amendment will substitute the 1st of June for the 1st of January, the obligation will in a great measure be removed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I agree in a great measure to what the Senator from Maryland has said in relation to preferences, and the justice of dividing a man's property pro rata among his creditors; and I agree with him also that there are times during a crisis and a panic that something more than the ordinary rule must be enforced. Business men must sometimes go outside of their ordinary practices in order to sustain men who would otherwise be in good credit and in strength, and be able to go through. If it is not known to the honorable Senator, it is known to all business men that there are but few men now engaged in business who have not at some time or other been carried over a difficult point. It is so every day in ordinary times; but in times like these, in the depreciation of property, and in the settlement of business growing out of the convulsions of the past five years, there is constant occasion for such interposition to avoid a crisis and a panic.

I desire simply to sustain the commercial and mercantile fabric, and I think that by providing for this measure going into effect at a later day we can bridge over a difficult point. Business men say that if they must stand, and are obliged to stand strictly by the provisions of this law, many men who would otherwise come through and would be able to pay all their debts must go into bankruptcy and pay but fifty or seventy-five per cent. of those debts. The country is in no condition to witness a panic. The business men of the country ought not to be called upon to consider the introduction of any new elements of disturbance in the management of their business relations and affairs. I agree with the Senator from Maryland that, in ordinary times he is right; but now, after having, as they have, gone through all the disturbing elements incident to the times, I think the business men of the nation should be permitted to use those agencies and those customary practices which have been familiar to them, and by the use of which they have been able to sustain the general public credit, and have carried through heretofore men who to-day are in good standing, and who pay their debts and from whom every creditor receives everything that is due to him. The question is simply whether you will make more bankrupts who are to be benefited by the provisions of the law, or whether you will make less. I disclaim any hostility to it as a bankrupt law. I acknowledge I had that purpose in the beginning; but the more I look at its provisions the more I am inclined to favor it. For that reason I desire that the business men of the country shall not have an excuse to unite with those who are disaffected toward it for its repeal; and I have assured myself, whether I am able to assure the Senate or not, that to fix a future day for its operation will contribute far more to its permanency than to make it go into effect now, receiving, as it will receive, all the hostility incident to an attempt to uproot the commercial fabric.

Mr. DRAKE. I feel constrained earnestly to insist upon the disposition of this bill which I have proposed, and the more the matter is discussed here the more I am satisfied that there are effects and results to flow from the adoption of this bill at this time which the Senate is not in any condition to foresee or to comprehend. Here is a proposition to put off until the 1st of January next the taking effect of the bankrupt act. I say without any hesitation at all that is to destroy the act entirely. If the taking effect of it is put off until the 1st day of January next then I venture the prediction that it never will take effect at all.

But, sir, I venture to say further that no Senator in this body can see fully the effect of the second proviso of this bill, "that nothing in this act contained shall be considered or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made prior to the taking effect of this act," that is prior to the 1st day of January, 1868. From this time till the 1st day of January, 1868, men are to have an opportunity to fix up and arrange their affairs, as the honorable Senator from Oregon said, so that there shall be no assets for their creditors.

I do not wish to go into a discussion now of the merits of this bill in all its bearings upon the original act; but I do earnestly insist upon obtaining the attention of the Senate sufficiently to induce them to send the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary in order to see what its bearings are, and to let the Senate know what is to be the result of voting for the passage of this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should prefer the reference of this bill, if there was time, for the committee to consider it, but of course a reference now will kill the bill.

Mr. DRAKE. Not necessarily.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is nothing in this proviso but a negative. It does not make anything valid. It simply prevents transactions from being invalidated by this law. There is no positive effect in this proviso, and certainly the Senator from Missouri cannot misapprehend the meaning of it. It is perfectly plain.

Mr. DRAKE. It is a most pregnant negative.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is to allow a man to do up to the 1st of June what he would have been allowed to do if this act had not passed.

Mr. DRAKE. Up to the 1st of January.

Mr. ANTHONY. The 1st of June the bill reads.

Mr. DRAKE. I understand that the bill has been changed so as to read "the 1st of January, 1868."

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir; that amendment is pending, but has not been adopted, and I trust my colleague will withdraw the amendment. If it will secure the assent of the Senator from Missouri to the bill, I am sure he will. This will only make the bankrupt law precisely what we thought it was when we passed it.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. CORBETT. Is it not in order to offer an amendment previous to the commitment of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to commit takes precedence of a motion to amend.

Mr. CORBETT. I hope that motion will be withdrawn to enable me to offer an amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. The amendment can be offered afterward, to go with the bill to the Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be in order if the Senate should refuse to commit the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to hear what the amendment is.

Mr. CORBETT. I have not examined the bankrupt law thoroughly, but I am told that it contains no limitation as to the number of times a party may take the benefit of the law. I think, for the benefit of creditors and to prevent wild speculation, there ought to be a provision in the law to prevent men taking the benefit of it perhaps more than twice. Therefore I wish to submit an amendment that parties seeking to take the benefit of this bankrupt law shall not have the privilege of taking the benefit of it more than twice.

Mr. ANTHONY. If my friend will allow me to interrupt him, I think that is provided for in the original law. I so understand it.

Mr. CORBETT. I made the inquiry. I have not examined it thoroughly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I so understand it; but this is not intended to amend the law in any respect, but only to fix the time at which it shall go into effect.

Mr. CORBETT. I have no objection to that. I only desired to offer an amendment covering that point if it was not provided for. If it is already provided for I am satisfied.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is so. Mr. President, I quote not by authority, but literally from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary when I say that the Judiciary Committee is the tomb of the Senate. If this bill goes there that is the end of it. Otherwise, I should be glad to have it go there, for I am sure that if this bill could be examined by every Senator it would meet with the unanimous vote of the Senate. I hope we shall now have a vote on the bill without referring it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on committing this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAMSEY. Now, would it be in order to move to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be in order, but it would be very injudicious. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEY. I make that motion. It is very important to clear off the executive Calendar, so that the rejections may be filled by other nominations.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senate will give us a vote on the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope if this bill is to be acted upon that it will be referred. It ought to be unquestionably, in order that the committee may look into it and see what the effect of it will be. I do not understand it. I was not sufficiently acquainted with the bankrupt bill in the first place, and the idea of extending the time for its going into effect by this bill and with these provisos, without knowing anything about the effect of them, or referring them to the Committee on the Judiciary, I will say is a simple piece of rashness that I hope will not be undertaken by the Senate. The committee can report it back tomorrow morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then if the Senator will allow me to make an amendment to his motion—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. He withdraws that.

Mr. RAMSEY. No, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, he is going to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I was not aware that I was.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am very anxious that he should, and I know that he will; and therefore I shall go on the same as though he did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his motion?

Mr. RAMSEY. I suppose I shall have to do so after that appeal.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the bill can be referred to the committee with instructions to report to-morrow morning I shall not object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They will report as soon as they can.

Mr. ANTHONY. They will not report it at all.

Mr. DRAKE. I object to the instructions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY. With instructions to report to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator move that amendment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the chairman is willing to take the instructions, I have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is impossible for the Committee on the Judiciary to consider all these questions and report upon them. We were in session three hours this morning. It will be utterly impossible for us to investigate and report upon this measure by to-morrow. If we had no other questions pressing upon us we might do so. We have a meeting to-morrow on another matter that we are now investigating. I will say to my friend from Rhode Island that so far as I am concerned, as one member of the committee, I would be prepared to act upon it as soon as we can with reasonable dispatch.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think we can determine upon the propriety of the amendment by to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should object to the instructions. However, we will try to carry out any instructions that the Senate gives us; but there are other matters before that committee which require its attention.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; I will take the assurance of the Senator that he will give it immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Before that motion is put I desire to say, for the information of the Senate, that, as I understand it, this bill in its present form was drawn by the honorable Senator who lately occupied a seat in this body, who had the care of the bankrupt bill during its passage through the Senate. It has been carefully drawn by him to meet the difficulties that he has foreseen. Since the act has gone into effect he concurs in the importance of the measure now before the Senate. He thought when this bill was upon its passage that it contained the provision which is now ingrafted in this bill, that it did take effect at a day in the future. It seems to me, therefore, that it is entirely unnecessary to refer it to the Judiciary Committee, when he, the best friend of the bankrupt law, its strongest advocate, and its leader in this body, has drawn the measure which removes the difficulties which are in the way of its operation. I trust, therefore, that the Senate will act upon it at once. I should prefer that they would act upon it and agree to the amendment that I have offered; but if they are not inclined to take that view, I hope they will pass it as he, the friend of the measure, has prepared it; and I think those who were originally opposed to it will also agree to it. I trust that it will not be sent to the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Frothinghuyssen, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Williams, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Edmunds, Harlan, Henderson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Pomerooy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, and Willey—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conkling, Davis, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Wade, and Yates—15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, in line seven to strike out the words "June next" and to insert "January, 1868."

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to have the bill read as it stands.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the fiftieth section of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, is amended so as to read as follows: "This act shall take effect on the 1st day of June next: Provided, That the appointment of officers created thereby, and the establishment of rules and general orders under such act, may be made at any time after the passage of this act: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith prior to the taking effect of this act."

Mr. STEWART. I hope that this amendment of the law will not be made. I hardly think the Senator from Rhode Island himself would want it in that shape. It will be liable to great abuse if it is put in that form. Of course the effect will be that any man who owes debts, and may be compelled to go into bankruptcy, will fix up some arrangement with his creditors immediately.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator that the question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE] to strike out "June next" and to insert "January, 1868."

Mr. STEWART. I thought it was on the other proposition.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, I move to amend the bill by striking out the last proviso, in these words:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith prior to the taking effect of this act.

Mr. STEWART. That is the provision on which I was remarking. I think that a very dangerous provision, and without careful consideration it ought not to go into the bill, because it will open the door to smuggling of property. If the bankrupt law is to take effect, and if there be a fair distribution of the assets under it, there ought not to be such a preference of the first creditors as that proviso would allow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow, with a view of proceeding to the consideration of the adjournment question.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us vote on this bill. We can take the vote immediately.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no probability of getting a vote. It has occupied all the day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall be allowed to have a vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the motion if Senators are ready to vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Rhode Island will consent to strike out the last proviso there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The last proviso is all there is in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The argument has been all along that the original intention was to fix the 1st day of June as the time when this act went into effect, but that owing to the peculiar phraseology of the last section of the law, that is not carried out. This bill is brought in to do that, but here is an additional proviso by which every man is advertised, "If you are in failing circumstances and know that you have got to fail before the 1st of June, we give you to the 1st of June to prefer certain creditors and put your property in the hands of a few individuals and cheat everybody else." If Senators wish to make the law as odious as it possibly can be made they will put on this proviso. That is the only effect of it, simply to tell everybody in trade who owes debts, "Avail yourself of this time; be in a hurry; prefer all your creditors, and make assignments as fast as possible."

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to inquire of the gentleman from Maine, who seems to be well acquainted with the subject, at what time the bankrupt act does take effect by its terms? Does it not take effect immediately on its approval by the President?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. So that it is really in force now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg the Senator's pardon; the fiftieth section of the bill reads as follows:

"That this act shall commence and take effect as to the appointment of the officers created hereby, and the promulgation of rules and general orders, from and after the date of its approval: Provided, That no petition or other proceeding under this act shall be filed, received, or commenced before the 1st day of June, A. D. 1867."

Mr. HOWARD. I think that quite sufficient as it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The point is just here: it was intended to make it take effect on the 1st day of June, but the provision simply goes as to the commencement of proceedings. Then the general law comes in, that is to say, that every act takes effect from the time of its passage; so that as to what is done by different creditors and different debtors between now and then is covered by the act, because it is in existence; whereas, if we put it off till June, and say, "You can do anything you please between now and June," the result will be precisely what I stated.

Mr. HOWARD. The result will be that thousands of assignments will be made to favorite creditors and trustees in real fraud of the act itself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand, and I should like to be informed by members of the Judiciary Committee, who are more familiar with it, whether there is not a provision in the law that any assignment made within four months previous to the act of bankruptcy, any conveyance to particular individuals, is invalid, or something of that sort.

Mr. DRAKE. I have it here, and can read it for the information of the honorable Senator if he wishes it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No matter; I understand it has that general provision.

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is understood that the act going into effect now covers the four months before, so as to effect certain things which have taken place, certain failures in the State of Rhode Island, and this amendment is made for a particular case or particular cases, as I understand it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not for any particular case or cases so far as I am concerned. It is intended to protect all transactions that would be legal if this law had not been passed. It does not make anything legal that was not so before. It merely says that this law, which goes into effect on the 1st of June, shall not make invalid that which was legal before the act was passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how far that may take place. I have not examined the bill sufficiently, and I supposed some member of the Judiciary Committee would explain, and let us see what the effect is if it goes into effect now, and what the effect will be if it does not go into effect until the 1st of June. For instance, if we put off the taking effect of the act until the 1st day of June, is every conveyance whatever between now and then legal and not affected by the act? If so, I am opposed to postponing it, and prefer that it should stand as it is.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Rhode Island tells us if this provision is stricken out the bill is gone. That simplifies the matter, and shows us that in his opinion the bankrupt law is really in force now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I perceive that; but I want to know from the Committee on the Judiciary precisely what the effect would be in relation to the matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. The thirty-fifth section of the act invalidates transactions that took place before the act was approved.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How long?

Mr. ANTHONY. A month. The Senator from Michigan, who has the act in his hand, will read it.

Mr. DRAKE. That is not the effect of the act on a careful examination.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me, I will read the thirty-fifth section of the act:

"SEC. 35. And be it further enacted, That if any person being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months before the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, procures any part of his property to be attached, sequestered, or seized on execution, or makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, either directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, the person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or to be benefited thereby, or by such attachment, having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such attachment, payment, pledge, assignment, or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value of it, from the person so receiving it, or so to be benefited," &c.

Forbidding really any preference of one creditor to another within the period of four months before this act shall take effect, or, in other words, before he files his petition or before a petition is filed against him. The provision contained in this bill, it seems to me, very clearly is in perfect antagonism with the thirty-fifth section of the act itself.

Mr. ANTHONY. There seems to be so much misapprehension about this subject that I would rather the bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will be a great deal better, and they can tell us to-morrow what the effect will be.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) to cover certain moneys in the control of the Navy Department into the Treasury;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 42) authorizing the employment of Brevet Brigadier General Seth Eastman on special service;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 44) relating to the sale of the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) in regard to the Rancho Panoche Grande claim in California.

The message further announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) concerning the uniform of persons in the diplomatic service.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON ORDINANCE.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses on ordinance, to report it back with an amendment, and as it will take but a moment, I should like to have it considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be taken up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution from the House of Representatives on the subject of an adjournment of Congress, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "that" in the second line of the resolution and to insert:

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized and directed to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 28th instant at twelve o'clock m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be considered by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution is before the Senate; and the question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment adjourns Congress on Thursday next.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask to have the original proposition from the House read, and then the substitute.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to move an amendment to the amendment? I think it very desirable that we should get through with the executive business at the same time as the legislative business, and I will move to insert "Friday" instead of "Thursday."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the reading of the original resolution from the House. If there be no objection it will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, (the Senate concurring.) That the Senate and House of Representatives do hereby each give consent to the other that each House of Congress shall adjourn the present session from the hour of twelve o'clock meridian on Thursday next, the 28th day of March instant, to reassemble again on the first Wednesday of May, the first Wednesday in June, the first Wednesday of September, and the first Wednesday of November of this year, unless the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall by joint proclamation, to be issued by them ten days before either of the times herein fixed for assembling, declare that there is no occasion for the meeting of Congress at such time.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the object of the reference to the Judiciary Committee of the resolution of adjournment that came from the House to have been to obtain their professional opinion upon the constitutionality of the resolution of the House. Some Senators as well as some Representatives made an objection to that resolution, that it was not warranted by the Constitution; and when I voted to refer the question to the Judiciary Committee it was in the hope that they would favor the Senate with their opinion on that very important question. It seems, however, that the committee have not thought it worth their while to express any opinion upon that most important point. For one, I am free to say that I have no doubt about the power of the two Houses to adjourn themselves in the way proposed by the House of Representatives. I think there is no constitutional embarrassment in the way; and from what I know now of public affairs, and from what I foresee in the future, I am fully persuaded that the resolution of the House is a wise one, and that we ought to adopt it. I hope, therefore, that the substitute coming from the Committee on the Judiciary will not be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. COLE. I concur fully with the Senator from Michigan as to the object of the reference of this resolution. I understood distinctly at the time that the object of referring it was to have a report as to the constitutionality of an adjournment in the mode proposed by the House resolution. I had no expectation that they would fail to pass any opinion upon that point, and substitute for that resolution one entirely different.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary it was advisable for Congress to adjourn without any provision for assembling in May and June, September and November, as is attempted to be provided by the House of Representatives. That being the opinion of the committee, of course it was unnecessary to inquire into the constitutionality of a different mode of adjournment. There are doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress to authorize the Presiding Officers of the two Houses by proclamations in advance to convene Congress; but that was a question which it was unnecessary to discuss, and unnecessary for the committee to express any opinion upon, inasmuch as the committee was of opinion that it was proper and best for Congress, when it adjourned, to adjourn without day, the present session closing, and the Constitution providing that Congress should assemble on the first Monday of December.

Mr. WILLEY. For myself I am perfectly satisfied with the conclusion to which the committee has come. Irrespective of the constitutional question, I doubt very much the propriety of passing such a resolution as came to us from the House. What is the position which Congress now occupies before the country? We have been engaged for nearly a month past in supplementing our past legislation. That, perhaps, was all very proper and right; but how do we stand, as I said, before the country at this time? The fact is, that the other House is not complete by the delegations from five of the loyal States. The other House is not to-day organized for business. We have been legislating here for a month without a complete representation in the other House; with five loyal States unrepresented in the other House; with but two or three committees in the other House; with one branch of the Legislature unorganized for the transaction of the business of the country. We pass bills here, and send them to the other House, where there is no committee to which they can be referred for revision and examination. They have to be taken peremptorily, and I may say, summarily, from the table, and passed in the other House without the necessary careful revision and examination of a committee.

Then, sir, there is another thing which I beg leave to bring to the notice of the Senate. I differ entirely with those Senators who suppose that the country desires Congress to remain here any longer. I think in that Senators are entirely mistaken. So far as my knowledge extends, there is an eager desire upon the part of the country that Congress should adjourn. The finances of the country, the commercial interests of the country, the mercantile interests of the country, the manufacturing interests of the country, are becoming sensitive. The business of the country is in a kind of state of abeyance, timid, under an apprehension of additional legislation on the part of Congress affecting the questions of the political economy of the country. Capital is fearful of investing itself in any project, in any improvement, in any business, in any enterprise, lest, by the interposition of legislation, the anticipations of men may be disappointed in the business in which they may engage. I know that it is the eager desire of the business interests of the country, at least so far as I have had any information from them, that Congress shall adjourn at as early a day as possible, so that the country may have eight months at least of repose, as was well said by the Senator from New York the other day, in which they may have a free track and a free course for the operations of their enterprises, without any apprehensions upon their part that Congress, by unexpected legislation, may interfere with their arrangements.

I have but one further word to add, and that is in reference to the character of the resolution which came to us from the House. It seems to me it would be the worst possible policy that Congress could possibly adopt to pass such a resolution as that. It would keep the country under constant apprehensions of congressional interference. Capital would not invest itself; enterprises would not be undertaken; the whole commercial business of the country would be deranged and retarded by the constant apprehension that in the interim between this time and the time to which Congress ordinarily adjourns, there might be a special session called, and that Congress might engage in some kind of legislation that would materially interfere with the business arrangements of the country. Therefore it does seem to me that, taking these things into consideration, it is very material to the best interests and welfare of the country that Congress should adjourn speedily, and adjourn to the latest period possible, until the ordinary time for the assembling of Congress at the commencement of the next session.

Mr. NYE. I confess myself quite surprised at the report of the Judiciary Committee. I submit to them and to the Senate whether the report they have made on the proposition referred to them from the House is treating a coördinate branch of this Congress with proper respect when they come in and say they have not investigated that question at all, but have concluded that this Congress had better adjourn.

If such a proposition as this had come from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and had gone to the other House, and had been reported on there in this way, so unusual as it seems to me, I apprehend the Senator from Illinois would have felt aggrieved at the conduct of the other House.

Now, Mr. President, upon the report that is made by the Committee on the Judiciary that it is best for Congress to adjourn I desire to say a few words. We are told by the Senator from West Virginia who has just taken his seat, that Congress ought to adjourn for the purpose of giving repose to the country, and giving stability to the great commercial and manufacturing interests of the country. I confess myself not a little surprised to hear from that careful Senator such a view of the effect of the session of Congress upon the people of this country. Sir, I yield to the suggestion and acknowledge the fact that this country needs repose. Where is the country to look for that repose? We have been rocked upon the billows of uncertainty and doubt by no action of Congress. Congress has stood here in the attitude of him who poured oil upon the troubled waters, for the purpose of giving that repose to the country which the distinguished Senator from West Virginia so much desires. I disagree with him in toto that the cause of this commercial and manufacturing discontent is attributable to the presence of Congress here. No, sir; so far from that being the case, the fact is that the eyes of this country with all its great interests are turned to Congress to-day as the only haven of repose wherein they can ride out this troubled condition of things.

Does the honorable Senator mean to say that the presence of Congress here creates discontent in the country? Why did it not occur then to the honorable Senator and the majority of this body when they passed the bill fixing an unusual time for the meeting of Congress, that that legislation would cause uneasiness and discontent to those great interests of the country? Sir, the Senator thought differently then, or I trust he would have voted differently. This Senate thought differently then and acted differently, and in accordance with the settled judgment and wishes of the majority of the people of this country. Where else have these great interests got to look now for repose? Do they look to the executive branch of this Government? For what reason? Has there been that course of action in that arm and force of the Government that is calculated to give repose to the country? On the contrary, I assert that the measures and the conduct of the Executive have rocked the interests of this country to their very base until the whole superstructure has toppled upon the base.

The country with one accord shouted for joy when this great measure was passed convening Congress on the 4th day of March. What for? That this Congress could stand here upon the tower as watchmen to give the alarm when danger approaches. And now we are told that the twenty-four days we have sat here have caused great discontent and uneasiness in the great interests of this country. I have looked for some evidence of that fact. I find none. I received this morning from a distant constituency the expression of the hope that Congress would continue in session. I know that the great mass of the people require that Congress should be in that position that in any emergency demanding it they can convene. It seems to me to have been trifling with the public confidence to have called this session for twenty-four days and then say that there exists no further necessity for its sitting, but on the contrary the great public interests demand that it should dissolve itself to-day. The contradiction in the reason that actuated the passage of this law and the action of Senators upon it now, is to me entirely inexplicable.

I do not know that the plan proposed by the House of Representatives and submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, at whose hands it has received no consideration, is the best plan; but this body ought to look to that committee, if that was not the best, to give us some improvement on it, for I submit it as a principle that no body of men, even though they be a committee, have a right to condemn one theory unless they can substitute in its place a better.

What has Congress done to create this uneasiness? The distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] will say that by this continuous session he has saved four or five hundred thousand acres of land to the country. Other great measures of saving and improvement have been adopted; and if Congress was not in session when would the bankrupt law, this great measure of relief, go into effect? It will be found that Congress, without disturbing any of the great interests of the country, can find business enough, so long as it sits, in providing measures of security for this country.

But, sir, that was not the object of this session of Congress. People may disguise it as they please; Senators may say now about it what they choose; but the real object that called this Congress together was to see to it that no measures were taken by the Executive of this nation to destroy its stability. I have seen nothing from that source that is calculated to increase my confidence in him at all. Two days ago he flirited in the face of this Senate one of the strangest messages that was ever written, one that was born in malice, and hurled back defiantly at the power that is now guiding this Government. If Senators see in that evidence of safety in intrusting the great interests of the country to his care at this peculiar moment, I confess they see what to me is not to be seen. Is he friendly to the great measure of reconstruction we have enacted? Let his own paper that lies upon your desk answer. He charges that the measures that Congress has put forth are unconstitutional from the beginning to the end, and he asserts now that those measures are at variance with the Constitution of the United States. Sir, I do not know what others may expect; but standing in his position, there is not a Senator on this floor but what could so conduct himself and shield himself under the protection of the Constitution as to make the reconstruction measure utterly inoperative. We are told that he has appointed good commanders for the several positions. Sir, a breath from him makes a commander, and another breath unmakes him. Your Schofields and your Popes and other generals may be supplanted to-morrow by men whose feelings are in accordance with his own, and your law will receive under their guidance such protection and such furtherance as vultures give to doves.

But, sir, there seems to be a sort of homesickness seizing upon the Senate. I am told that in armies occasionally it really amounts to a disease, so that it is not a crime to desert, and prudent commanders on such occasions always examine and diagnose carefully to see whether the soldier means to desert or whether he is afflicted with a disease that he cannot help. If that is the case here, the Senators who are so much in favor of an adjournment will probably go home if they have that disease, and I do not expect what I say will change the result. My friend from Illinois seems to be afflicted with it bad; and so far from considering measures that are sent here, his only cry is "adjourn immediately." That is the report of the Judiciary Committee—adjourn. I have high respect for their opinion; but, sir, I desire that when the evil hour shall come, as in my judgment it will between this and December, the people shall not look at me and say "You did it."

If the proposition of the House proposes to convene Congress too often, I submit to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary whether he had not better propose to have but two meetings during the summer. What objection can there be to that? None, but the objection raised that it will give repose to the country if Congress is not to come together. I have said upon that subject all I desire to say. If the people of this nation look to any other haven of rest and repose but in the Congress of the United States now, they are sure to ride out in an uncertain roadway and a terrible storm. Sir, in this haven and harbor of the Congress of the United States, in this power that has taken the government of the rebellious States and of this country into its own hands, in this power that uses the Executive now but simply as a clerk to make a mark upon bills to show that they have been there in the ordinary routine of business, the country looks for that repose which the Senator from West Virginia so much desires that the people should enjoy.

I hope, sir, if the Senate entertain objections to the measure proposed by the House, that they will at least provide some way by which Congress can control itself, and in case of any emergency will be able to come together by virtue of the rule or the law that they themselves fix, and have it depending upon their will whether they shall assemble or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not care a great deal how this question is decided; but there are some things in the remarks of the honorable Senator from Nevada that I cannot help noticing. It is very difficult to reply to him at any time. He indulges so much in tropes and figures, his imagination is so fervid, and he has such beautiful illustrations at his tongue's end, that it is very difficult in replying to keep to the facts and overlook his figures of speech; but after all, this is to be decided by the matter of fact instead of figures of speech.

My friend has made a very severe imputation or insinuation with regard to the members of this Senate who are for adjournment, and that is, that they must be afflicted with homesickness. In other words, it is suggested that the large majority of this Senate who vote to adjourn to December, instead of being influenced by public considerations and their views of duty, are merely following out their own personal convenience and comfort; they are in a hurry to get home, and therefore they are ready to sacrifice what the best interests of the country demand. I can put no other construction upon his language. My friend will permit me to say to him in all kindness that I have not been absent, except detained by sickness in my lodgings, for many years from daily attendance upon my duties here. I have neither been to New York nor to Philadelphia nor anywhere else. I have stayed in Washington, ready, to the best of my ability to discharge my duties. Homesickness has not affected me; but I will say to my friend that if I had spent all my time at home pretty much during the last session and got here only a few days before it adjourned, it would have been hard then if I had been homesick. [Laughter.] I should have had no excuse for being homesick under such circumstances. Those Senators who had been at work here all the time might have had an excuse, but under such circumstances I should have had none.

Well, sir, I do not claim any such exemption. I claim to be influenced by no considerations in the vote that I give on this subject, except simply my views of what is advisable. It may be that in my view the opinions of the people that I represent differ somewhat from the opinions of the people of Nevada on the subject, who are so near and so thoroughly acquainted with public affairs, and so every day in communication with them, that they can tell better than anybody else what is going on here, and what it is advisable for us to do! I have seen no testimony that the people of the country expect at our hands what the honorable Senator seems to suppose. He says that he knows that the people of this country demand that we should continue in session. How does he know it? Where does he get his information? He gives as an illustration one letter from his own constituents. I have heard of nothing else. Where are the newspapers that have called upon us to continue in session? To be sure I do not know as much about them as others, but I have seen no such overwhelming testimony of public opinion coming from that source; and I certainly have seen no such overwhelming testimony on the subject coming from any other source. I regret that I am not better informed on the subject; but when Senators rise here and tell us that they know what public opinion is, I should like to be informed how they know it. Is it anything more than their impression and their belief? And if so, may not others have an impression and a belief of a different kind from other sources of information? I do not yield, therefore, to that argument on the subject. It is not conclusive to my mind.

I have heard but one argument and that is, the inquiry, "What was this particular session for at this time? Was it not designed that we should meet in March and keep ourselves almost in continuous session, or, at any rate, in a condition to meet often?" Why, sir, I did not understand that to be the reason. The reason of this session being called on the 4th of March I always understood to be in order to organize this Fortieth Congress, especially the House of Representatives. We have now a President who was elected Vice President. If he should die, the next officer is the President of the Senate. We had then but two lives in being, to use a legal term. It was thought important that the Congress should be organized so that we might have a Speaker of the House, who might be next in succession; and the last being the short session, it was supposed also that there might be some necessary legislation to be accomplished. Senators are perfectly aware that it was supposed that we should have too short a time in order to pass those bills which we thought necessary in order to tie the hands of the President; that we could not get them through; that some of them might slip and that it might be important for us to have another session in order to pass that necessary legislation. I never heard any other reasons given than those. If there were others they were not submitted to me.

It was on the strength of those considerations that I was willing to allow this session to be held, so far as my vote was concerned; on the 4th of March. I did not go any further than that. It seemed to me that that was a sufficient reason, and under the circumstances of the case I was not disposed to put myself in the way of it at all.

Well, sir, we have met. Will the honorable Senator tell me what legislation is left unfinished calling for our attention? Is there any? Is there any bill that the Senator desires to pass? Is there anything further that he wants to do in order to diminish the power which the President has hitherto exercised? No Senator will pretend that there is one single thing left, that everything has not been done that was desired to be done with reference to that matter. We have settled the question of the appointment of officers by the President in our own way, to our own satisfaction. We have even limited his military power, so far as it was thought advisable to limit and where we had the power to limit it under the Constitution of the United States, gone as far in that direction as we desired. What more is there to be done? What do Senators desire to accomplish? Nobody has suggested a single measure of that description or any other that it is desirable for us to act upon in the way of legislation.

But Senators say, "We must be in session, or be in a condition to meet, for we do not know whether the President will carry out these laws." Sir, can we make him carry them out by remaining in session? Suppose he chooses to do or not to do just precisely what Senators desire either to accomplish or avoid; is there anything further we can do? What pressure can we bring to bear upon the President to compel him to carry out these laws in any other way than he feels disposed to do? Sir, he must have time. With the best enjoyment of all the opportunities that may be presented, making the most of the time between now and next fall, there is not more than enough to afford a fair chance for the experiment that we have instituted. Up to September the time must be taken up entirely in making out the registration of voters. Is there anything that Senators could do before that, or that the President could do before that? Suppose the President while we are in session chooses to change these officers he has appointed and appoint others; can we legislate so as to prevent it? Have we any power over the subject in any possible way whatever? Can we accomplish anything in that line by remaining in session? Senators will not pretend that we can in any way.

What, then, have we to watch? If I could see anything to be accomplished even in the direction that Senators argue, I should be perfectly willing to stay here; and I am not unwilling now. I am not contending against any change of the resolution. My own judgment is one way; but I am perfectly willing to accede to the views of the majority of the Senate on the subject, whatever they may be. I yield when I find the majority is against me, and I do not complain of others and accuse them of being influenced by bad motives, because they happen to differ from me in judgment, if the majority differs with me, because I am apt to think the majority is more likely to be right than the minority as a general rule, and I yield.

Senators talk about the conduct of the President in relation to certain matters. That I do not choose to discuss; but we are too old and too sensible to yield to arguments that do not apply to the question at all. I make no issue about that and do not discuss it; but granting all that Senators choose to say, has it any application to this question of adjournment that the conduct of the President has not been satisfactory to us and has been such as we totally disapprove, unless you can point out some way, some mode in which or by which the President is still to accomplish evil? If we have done all that we can do as legislators, and there is nothing left for us, what object is there in these adjournments from day to day? Unless you can show me an object, something that is to be done, some power that we shall have to prevent evil, I ask why these adjournments from month to month in the way proposed? Are they dignified, or will they do good or do evil?

My judgment is, and has been from the beginning, that having accomplished all by way of legislation that we can accomplish, it being perfectly out of our power to act further on the question of reconstruction, the matter having gone out of our hands, the time between now and the ordinary period of our assembling being no more than is necessary in order to try this experiment fairly and see what is to be done, only evil comes from keeping the country in a state of expectation of something that is to occur by the meeting of Congress. The business matters of this country are of considerable consequence. I believe I feel that they have been kept even by this session of Congress in a state of continued and continuous agitation and alarm. Why? Because both Houses of Congress have been filled at previous sessions with all sorts of financial schemes constantly laid upon the table, started by A, B, C, D, E, and F, without much consideration, I think; in many cases, and getting votes sometimes for fun and sometimes for mischief, that only increase the agitation and keep the business interests of the country in a constant state of alarm. If I am rightly informed, there have been several new financial schemes laid on the table of the other House this morning. So long as we are in session, and so long as we do not look forward to anything permanent or consider anything as settled, the result of fixing times ahead for the meeting of Congress in case somebody should think it advisable, and for Congress not to come together if somebody should think it not advisable, is to do harm, to agitate the country without any possible good. If gentlemen will point out to me any way in which any injury can be done by the Executive that can be avoided by our being in session and by any legislation we can adopt I shall yield to the force of their logic; but unless they do so I really must remain of my original opinion.

Mr. NYE. I did not intend to impugn anybody's motives in regard to this matter, and I do not think it is fairly inferable from any language I used. Twice since this discussion commenced the fact has been mentioned that I was absent from the Senate during the greater part of last session. I presume that fact caused no regret on the part of either of the Senators who mentioned it. It will be a relief to them when they reflect that the Government has saved so much by my not being here all the time.

I know how dangerous it is to fall under the knife of my friend from Maine. He accuses me of indulging in fancy in regard to this question. I have two or three inquiries to put in all candor to that Senator and to the Senate. Do I indulge in any fancy when I say that the times are very extraordinary? If so, I impeach the judgment of these two great deliberative bodies, for whose judgment I have the highest respect. If the times had not been unusual this Congress would not have been convened at this unusual period, and it will hardly satisfy the country to declare, even with the indorsement of the distinguished Senator from Maine, that the only object was to organize the two Houses of Congress. The more rational and more satisfactory reply is that this Congress was convened at this unusual time because themselves were unusual and demanded a close watching by the law-making power of this country.

The Senator from Maine seems to have great misgivings for fear some new financial measure will be introduced and discussed. In my judgment Congress cannot better occupy itself for two months than in investigating and putting forth new measures of finance for this country. What I suggest now will be history ere this Congress convenes again. Sir, have the people of this country got so afraid of Congress that they shudder when there is any measure brought forth here for consideration in this body? If so, it would have been better for the Senator from Maine, as well as myself, to have been absent, not only up to the close of the late session, but for the whole session. If it is true that the people have got so that they distrust Congress to that extent that the mere introduction of a measure for its consideration is alarming to the business interests of the country, we had better go home and stay there, and we had better not have come.

Do the Senator from Maine and those in favor of an immediate adjournment now mean to say that the summit and sum-total of human wisdom upon all these questions has been exhausted? I take it not. If so, they will find those coming after us foolish or wise enough to introduce new measures and discuss them. Sir, in behalf of Congress I assert that it is doing great injustice to itself to make a public acknowledgment that its session tends to disturb the business interests of the country. In my judgment it is not true, come from what source it may.

The Senator from Maine inquired whether Congress if it is in session, and if the Executive does not do his duty, can do anything. I answer that it can. I understand it to be a constitutional duty of the President of the United States to see that every law which Congress passes is faithfully and energetically executed. I understand that if he fails to do that he is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor. If Congress is in session or in such a position that it can come together, if the fact is palpable that he fails to execute these important laws that are to build up our waste places and heal the breaches, it can inquire the reason why, and it is the only tribunal that can inquire. If it be true that he persists in willful disobedience to the mandates of Congress and the mandates of the Constitution, here sits the tribunal to put him out of the way. But we are told that the very idea of that disturbs manufactures and commerce. Sir, above the momentary success of commerce and manufactures, towering clear above them and their interests as momentarily affected, stands the great question of rebuilding and completing the rebuilding of this structure that has been so willfully torn down; and the commercial and manufacturing interests of this country had far better suffer from agitation momentarily than that this great work should be stopped. When it shall be completed they will have a permanent prosperity founded upon a united and a happy country, and until that time arrives let me tell the Senator from Maine there never will be substantial commercial and manufacturing prosperity in this country. To enhance the chances of doing that immediately I submit to the good sense of the Senate to say whether Congress should not be in a position where it can come to the rescue if it is needed.

Mr. YATES. I do not know that I have anything special to add to what I said on this subject the other day; but some of the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Maine induce me to say a few words on this occasion.

I regard the question as a very important one, indeed. It is certainly regarded as an important question by the country. I presume there is no question which could be submitted to our constituents in which they feel a more deep and vital interest than this question of adjournment at the present time. I agree with the honorable Senator from Nevada that the Judiciary Committee have not, as I understand it, discharged their duty in relation to the question submitted to them by the Senate. The resolution passed by the House was regularly referred by the Senate to that committee, and they have made their report; but, as I understand the chairman, the committee have not considered at all the proposition that was referred to them by the Senate; in other words, as the committee had determined that Congress ought to adjourn on Thursday next, they thought it was not necessary to consider the House resolution which the Senate referred to them. It is not for me to say what was the duty of that committee; but the question referred to them was the resolution which came from the House of Representatives, and that was a proposition to adjourn on Thursday to stated periods, so that Congress might continue in position to assemble at any time when the Presiding Officers of the two Houses might call them together. I would not refer to the action of the committee but that I consider the proposition of the other House decidedly preferable, in every respect, to the proposition reported by the committee.

In the first place no possible harm can result to the country or to Congress from the measures proposed by the House. It does not bring us here unless it is necessary and important that we should come. We can be at home and stand adjourned just as much as we should be if we passed the proposition of the chairman of the committee, unless some emergency should arise calling upon Congress to be here. On the other hand, if an emergency arises which shall justify legislative interposition or legislative action, we can all trust, I am sure, to the Presiding Officers of the two bodies to call us together.

Mr. President, we are in the midst of extraordinary times. The country is apparently at peace, but the great object for which we have had a gigantic war is not yet accomplished. We have done much, I may say, indeed, we have done almost everything; the flag of the enemy trails in the dust at the feet of our victorious hosts, and we have established a policy of reconstruction which I believe will stand, which I believe if it can be successfully carried out without interposition from any source, will meet the approbation of the country and result in the reestablishment of this Union upon a basis of prosperity such as it was before the war began. But our mission has not yet been accomplished; this country is not yet restored; the Union is not yet unbroken; all the stars are not yet upon our flag; reconstruction is not yet complete, nor will it be complete until the rebel States themselves have taken action, until they have responded by their votes and by their conduct to the action of Congress. Then the question arises, how are the measures of Congress to be carried out, and by whom except by Congress itself? Have we the approbation or the favor of the Supreme Court? Is the President ready to aid in the accomplishment of these measures?

The Senator from Maine asked the question what good will it do for us to remain in session, can we compel the President to do differently from what he would do were we adjourned? I say yes. If the President refuses to execute the laws that have been adopted by Congress, if he fails to carry out the measures which have been enacted, this Congress will stand ready to impeach the President for refusing to carry them out. But if we adjourn over, without keeping ourselves in position, the President may pursue just what course he pleases; he may execute these laws or not execute them; he may retain in power the present generals of the Army whom he has appointed to execute these laws, or he may at his pleasure have others in their places, and what position will Congress occupy? The ridiculous, disgraceful, cowardly position of having abandoned their posts and left the execution of these laws to the President himself. Sir, this is like planting the corn, and hoeing it, and plowing it, and cultivating it to the full ear and then leaving that ear to rot and to decay upon the ground. Shall we stop before we have carried out this work of reconstruction? Has this war been in vain? Have all these millions of money been expended in vain? Have our plans of reconstruction for a year or more occupied the attention of Congress for naught? And shall we now forsooth, men who should be sentinels upon the watch-tower of liberty to protect the rights of the people, leave the execution of these measures, the carrying out of this policy, in the hands of a man who has opposed us from the start, who has connived with our enemies, who has proved false to his promises and to his pledges?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? Does not the Constitution settle who shall execute the laws? What can Congress do to execute them? We are to legislate.

Mr. YATES. The Constitution unfortunately does fix upon the President, upon the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy and the Army, the duty of executing these laws. The argument which I made was that if he shall fail to do it, if he shall fail to execute the laws, then we ought to be in a position where we can be called together by the Presiding Officers of the two bodies to bring in articles of impeachment, and to punish the President for the commission of high crimes and misdemeanors. But the honorable Senator from Maine says, "No, we will go to our homes; we will deprive ourselves of this power; we will cut ourselves off from this right; and if the President does not choose to execute these laws, we cannot reassemble until the regular time." Which is the wisest policy, that proposed by the House of Representatives or by the committee of the Senate?

Mr. President, a good deal has been said about public opinion on this subject. I am not one of those who bend to public opinion unless I think that public opinion is right; but in this country the popular will is the breath, the life, the soul of the Government; and prestige is a great deal in the settlement of every question. When we have the people on our side, Congress may move forward; but if the people are not on our side, Congress cannot move forward.

Suppose we adjourn over now, and the President, as he believes these laws are unconstitutional, as he is not at heart for them, fails to execute them, or so feebly executes them that he does not carry out the plans and designs of Congress, he has until late in the fall, some eight or nine months to wait for a change in public sentiment, to await the returns of elections; and to take advantage of anything that may occur in the mean time. I believe that the people of this country expect of Congress to maintain its position, to carry out its policy, and for that reason I am opposed to the report of the committee; and I can vote very cheerfully, for I think there is no constitutional difficulty in the way, for the resolution which has been submitted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, is it in order to move to amend the amendment reported by the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOWE. If so, I move to amend the amendment by striking out all the words which the committee propose to insert, and to insert after the word "that:"

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on Friday, the 23d day of March, at twelve o'clock meridian, adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of June; and that on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1867.

I should like to see this amendment agreed to, and I cannot conceive for my life what valid objection can be urged against it. It proposes to adjourn the two Houses just one day later than that named by the amendment of the committee. I think that additional day we need here for executive business if for no other. It proposes to reserve the right to the Representatives to reconvene here on the first Monday of June next if they choose to do so. That is all. No man is compelled to come. It reserves the right to the Representatives to reassemble here if they choose to reassemble here at that time, or if there is a public exigency which calls upon them to reassemble.

What possible objection can any Senator or any Representative have to retaining such a privilege as this, or such a right as this, or such a power as this, call it whichever you may? Who knows, who can now foresee but what this disease, which the Senator from Nevada has characterized, I hope inaccurately, as homesickness, may take a new form by June next? Who knows but that by that time we may get sick of home and want to come back to these Halls again? What objection to having a legal right to do so? Every Senator and every Representative comes as a volunteer. The resolution is imperative, if this amendment be adopted, upon the Presiding Officers of the two Houses to adjourn the two Houses on that day again until December, unless the two Houses otherwise order and direct them, and they cannot otherwise direct them unless a quorum shall be assembled here voluntarily. Is a quorum likely to assemble voluntarily unless it should happen that some exigency should arise, some contingency should present itself which seemed to impress upon the mind of the individual Senators and Representatives the duty of returning here?

I cannot conceive of any contingency in which the provision can do any harm; but you ask me what possible good it can do. Sir, I wish that question would not be pressed upon me, for that is the difficult one to answer. [Laughter.] I cannot just now say what practical good will result from having this right reserved to us to reassemble in June. Yes, Mr. President, I correct myself. I think I can mention just one good that will arise from it. It is suggested to me by the argument of the Senator from West Virginia; it is enforced by the argument recently made by the Senator from Maine. Those Senators have appealed to the body against reserving this right to reassemble here on any future day between this and December, because such a possibility, such a contingency held up before the American people, they seem to think keeps the American people in a state of perpetual consternation, business is unsettled, commerce is pursued staggeringly, every branch of human effort is carried on under difficulties. If that is so—and it does not become me to controvert any assertion made by the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Maine—if that is so, it is necessary to be corrected, because Congress and its meetings occasionally are a constitutional necessity; and if people are so alarmed at the prospect of an assembling of the Congress of the United States they must be taught to rise above that fear.

Professor Rarcy, I remember, had one way of overcoming this weakness in those that he undertook to deal with. When he had a horse that was unnecessarily nervous and apprehensive of objects that he encountered, his way was to enforce upon his observation, to press upon the observation and notice of the horse the object which he was apt to shun; gradually approach it until he could get him to smell of it, and so teach him to disregard the object. I do not think, in view of what is said here of the extreme nervousness and apprehensiveness of the American people in view of a Congress, that it would actually do at once to let the people smell of a Congress, but I think we can put one out toward them, hold up the possibility of it, and in time they will learn to contemplate such a thing as the meeting of an American Congress and not fall flat before it. I hope to live to see that time come. And this, I think, is one way in which we can educate the people to contemplate this great horror, to familiarize themselves with it gradually, and finally consent to it.

Mr. President, if it be so, as it is said to be, that the business of this country cannot go on while the national Legislature is in session; if it be so, as it is said to be, that the laying of a bill upon the table of the House of Representatives occasions an ague on State street, in Boston, and a panic in Wall street, the sooner that business is educated above that state of apprehensiveness and nervousness the better; and in this point of view I would very much like to see the amendment adopted. But it is not the only one, for these are extraordinary times. That cannot be denied. You do not know what may happen in the next sixty days. There may be a state of things arising within that time which would impress it upon the minds of individual Senators as a duty that they should come back here. Why? What for? Certainly in no possible event to act as watch-dogs of the Presidential Mansion. I do not contemplate any such thing as that. We have our peculiar, our particular, our especial vocation, and I have no idea of seeing it changed. If we come here at all, we come to do the constitutional work of a constitutional Legislature, and for nothing else. But there may be, I say, an occasion for such work as that in the next sixty days. We cannot foreknow that there will not be, and since there is no possible inconvenience to arise from reserving this power in the resolution, I really wish the Senate would do it; and besides, it seems to me we thus show a disposition to reconcile our views with a view which seems to be prevalent in the other House, and so we seem to be approaching a mutual agreement, approaching some plan upon which the two Houses can adjourn at some time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The rumor has floated upon the air during the whole existence of the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and during the brief period of the Fortieth Congress, that the President of the United States is to be impeached. I have yet to learn from the utterance of a statesman in whom the public have confidence, or of a press to whose teachings the public give implicit credence, that this is a remedy for existing evils. I am so unfortunately situated in this body as not to belong to a presidential republican party, or to a congressional republican party. As far as the indications of each in action have been manifested I differ widely, very widely from both. But, sir, I will now take occasion to say that which I have not said publicly before, but which I have felt all the time in my heart of hearts, that if the President of the United States would allow himself to be impeached, and before conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors upon which he may be arraigned allow himself to be deposed from his high authority, as has been suggested, he ought to be impeached.

Sir, it may be said that this is throwing defiance in the teeth of the omnipotence of the American Congress. It may be that it is disloyal to utter such a sentiment as that. It is not uttered in the spirit of defiance, and as for "disloyalty," I have heard enough of it for the last sixty years to subject the word only to my personal contempt. The Constitution of the country, if there be any Constitution left, and if there be any country left over which that Constitution is the supreme law of the land, points out the mode and the manner in which a high official shall be arraigned. For the first time in the history of our Government, which has stood for eighty or ninety years, we find it threatened every day that our independent and coordinate branch of the Government shall be arraigned before the other and tried. That may be proper; but it is further intimated that before trial and before conviction that coordinate branch of the Government has a right to lay its omnipotent hand upon the other and dispossess it of its constitutional rights, and subject it, and not only it but every power of the Government, to the absolute will and control of this usurping authority. Sir, if that be the theory of the American Constitution; if that be the teaching of our fathers; if that be the doctrine taught by the establishment upon a written charter of a Government of coordinate and equal powers, I have been unable to appreciate that form of government; and if it has come to this, then I say, as one of the humblest members of this body, come despotism in your worst form; come ye usurpers of government and of administration, and subject the rights and the liberties of the people to your absolute control. Whatever personal consequence may attach to me, I utter my voice of protest against it, and say that never did a man fill the executive chair of the nation who ought to submit to such a tyrannical exercise of power; and I say now, without any offense to the gentlemen with whom I associate, "If this be treason, make the most of it."

Mr. DRAKE. I cannot regard the question now before the Senate otherwise than as one of the most important that has been before it since it assembled as a part of the Fortieth Congress, and as one of the most important that is likely to come before it while it is in session. I propose, in addition to some remarks which I made the other day, to state my views on some points presented by the honorable Senator from Maine, and before doing so I must express my great regret at finding myself obliged to differ from one so justly distinguished in this body and before the country as that gentleman.

Mr. President, turn it which way we may, look at it how we may, a vote of adjournment now over to next December is one of two things: either a declaration to the country that Congress has confidence in the Administration, or that Congress is powerless to check or control that Administration by appropriate legislation. I do not propose by my vote to make either declaration to the country. I do not intend, so far as my individual action is concerned, to say to the people whom I represent here that "all is quiet on the Potomac;" for it is not quiet here, and we know it is not. Nor do I intend to say to them that if the President chooses to take this, that, or the other course in the execution or non-execution of the laws which we have passed Congress has no power to lay its hand upon him. One or the other of these two things, in my opinion, a present adjournment over to next December, is the declaration of Congress, and cannot be construed to be otherwise.

The honorable Senator from Maine asks, apparently with the conviction that it is unanswerable, what legislation is undone that the exigencies of the country require? Sir, I admit that to all appearances what we know at this moment of the exigencies of the country has been met by the legislation that has been consummated; but can the Senator from Maine tell what other legislation may not be needed before sixty or even thirty days shall have passed over our heads. We know, we need not be told, that we are dealing with a people who are wide-awake to everything that can furnish an opportunity to them to shake off what they call the shackles of an odious tyranny; and we know, too, that at the other end of the avenue is an executive officer who is in sympathy with them, and not in sympathy with Congress and its legislation.

And can we tell that there may not arise within thirty days after we leave here an exigency as great as any which this Congress or its predecessor has been called upon to meet. If we were in ordinary circumstances there would be no objection to our going hence until December. If we were in ordinary circumstances there would have been no occasion for the Fortieth Congress to meet on the 4th of March, and the very fact that it did meet is an indication to the world that there was an exigency which had to be met. Why did no previous Congress ever meet to organize, as the Senator from Maine says? During the term for which General Harrison was elected the Vice President went from your chair to the White House for three years and eleven months, and Congress never thought of meeting on the 4th of March to elect a Speaker to put him in the line of succession to the presidency. Under the Administration of Mr. Pierce the Vice President died, and your chair became vacant; but Congress was never called together for the purpose of electing a Speaker to put him in the line of the presidency; nor in General Taylor's term either. Why not? Because the exigencies of the country did not demand it. Why did the Thirty-Ninth Congress pass an act convening this Congress but that the exigencies of the country did demand it in an imperative degree? Now, we are called upon to leave here, to disperse, to go home, to tell the country all is safe in the hands of Andrew Johnson; all is safe in the hands of a President who declares your laws unconstitutional; all is safe in the hands of a President who is in sympathy with the very men and the very States over whom those laws are intended to be operative for the restoration of the Union.

Sir, I cannot do this thing. A sense of duty to the loyal people I represent forbids that under any circumstances I should give my assent to this Congress dispersing for more than eight months to come. I hope that something like the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be adopted by this body. I hope for the peace and the quiet of the loyal men of the country that they will not be made to believe by the action of this Congress that they can have no hope whatever, let the President do what he may, between now and December. I would prefer an amendment similar to that of the Senator from Wisconsin in a little different shape; that is, providing more than one day between now and December when Congress may meet; and if his amendment shall fail, I have one prepared which I will offer to cover that state of the case.

But, Mr. President, one word more. I make no imputations upon the motives which lead gentlemen to vote in favor of an adjournment over until December; it does not become me or any other Senator to make imputations upon the motives of Senators; but I can state my own motive for the course I pursue, and that is that this nation shall, if Congress can do it, be guarded at every point against the machinations of men who would yet destroy it if they could. With me it would be motive enough to sit here in my seat every day until December to know that it is possible that the designs and devices which are still cherished for the destruction of this nation had a possibility of being carried out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not altogether agree with the honorable Senator from Missouri in construing an adjournment as a declaration to the country that Congress has confidence in the Executive or into a declaration that Congress is disposed to abandon the performance of its duty. I say that the construction to be put upon the act of Congress in adjourning at this time is in the first place that it has been usual from the beginning of the Government for the adjournment to take place about this time, and in adjourning, as is proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, we only follow those precedents that have been established since the formation of the Government; and it further amounts to a declaration on the part of Congress that we believe the legislation which has been enacted is sufficient for the protection of the country, and that we have put such guards around and such checks upon the Executive by our legislation as to protect the country and promote the restoration of the Union.

I construe the other proposition to adjourn from time to time, as proposed by the House of Representatives, as a declaration to the country on the part of Congress that in their judgment there is some great impending danger; and that declaration on the part of Congress will disturb the public mind, and the people will ask each other, "What does this extraordinary proceeding mean, and where is that great and hidden danger that is coming upon the country? Congress must understand it; they must have some means of knowledge not within our reach?" The people will justly construe this act as an apprehension on their part that some great calamity, some unseen calamity is about to befall the country, and that it is necessary that Congress should assemble from time to time during the summer to prevent the effects of that calamity.

Now, sir, what does this mean? We find that those distinguished gentlemen who seemed most reluctant to provide a speedy way for the restoration of the Union are now most anxious to continue this session of Congress, in order, according to the declaration of some of them, to facilitate the return of the rebel States to the Union. Now, sir, does this mean impeachment or not? That is the question. Suppose Andrew Johnson should make the laws we have passed for reconstruction inoperative; what follows? Are not those States left in their present condition? Is anybody to be harmed if the rebel States are not restored in the next six months? Suppose the restoration shall be put off for one year; who is harmed? Cannot Congress endure that continuance of the present state of things? Cannot the country endure it? Who is it that is so very anxious that Congress should stay together to compel the Executive to go forward and make an immediate restoration of those States to the Union? Sir, we have passed a law by which we have opened the doors of the Union to those States. We have invited them to come in upon our terms. Upon the President devolves the responsibility of executing that law. If he fails in the performance of his duty he will be answerable to the grand tribunal of this nation for his failure to perform his duty. But even if those laws should fail until the 1st of December to produce their intended effect, the nation, in my judgment, will not suffer; for so far as I am individually concerned I think no matter what obstacles Andrew Johnson may put in the way, those States will have their representatives in Congress just as soon as the interests of this country will warrant. All he can do, and all that these gentlemen pretend that he can do, is simply to put off the restoration of those States, by a failure to execute our law, for a certain length of time; and I cannot possibly perceive what grave danger will result even if he should pursue that course. But this is altogether a matter of suspicion. Although I have no very exalted opinion of the President, I do not regard him as a very bold man; and I doubt very much, with Congress constituted as it is to-day, whether he will take the responsibility of trampling under his feet the legislation of the last Congress; and so far as present indications point he is disposed to execute the law according to the expectations of those who made it.

Now, sir, I am afraid that the people of this country will understand that this proposal for Congress to assemble during the summer is simply intended to facilitate proceedings for the impeachment of the President. I express no opinion upon that subject; but I say, if we intend to do it, let us do it boldly and fearlessly and above board, and not under some other pretense make an arrangement by which Congress may be called together for that purpose, if possibly there should be some reason discovered for such a proceeding.

This proposition clearly contemplates that this meeting of Congress is to be a kind of contingency, and when Congress assembles, the Presiding Officers of the two Houses are to adjourn them unless otherwise ordered. The representatives of the people are scattered from one end to the other of this vast country, and every man is compelled to decide as to whether an exigency has arisen or not requiring the Representatives and Senators to assemble. Some may decide one way and some may decide another. Some may stay away supposing there is no exigency requiring their attendance; others may be here. There may be a part of a Senate and part of a House; and when they assemble, and in the absence of the Representatives and Senators of many of the States, they may proceed to the transaction of business. I say this sort of proceeding opens the door for great mischief. I would much prefer, if we are to have a session in the summer time, to have it understood that there is to be a regular session of Congress for the transaction of business, and then let all the Senators and Representatives assemble; but so long as there is to be a session and it is understood that there is to be no business transacted, unless certain persons shall determine that it is necessary to transact business, it puts the whole interests of the country in the hands of a few persons who may see proper to assemble at that time.

There are Senators and Representatives here from the Pacific coast. They have a right, I suppose, to return to their constituents during an adjournment. If this proceeding takes place, if a certain number of Senators and Representatives should assemble on the first Monday of June and conclude to proceed with any business, even with an impeachment, they of course will have no voice in the matter, because it will be impossible for them to be here to participate after receiving notice that it has been decided, after these gentlemen have assembled, that they will proceed with the transaction of business. I should like to know in reference to this resolution, whether it is necessary for the Senators and Representatives from that coast and remote parts of the country to remain here with a view of transacting business during the summer, or whether they can safely return to their constituents? Certainly no very important business ought to be transacted unless all the States that are now represented in Congress are represented at that time.

In view of all these considerations, in view of the fact that nobody knows of any reason, and it is only suspected that some reason may possibly arise for what is proposed, it seems to me that our true course is to adjourn Congress, to show to the people of this country that we are convinced that at the present time there is no danger, that the country is safe. The people understand the President as well as we do. They know what he has done and what he will do. I have failed to hear any gentleman answer the question as to how we can control the Executive if we do remain in session. Can we execute the laws? Can he not go forward and appoint such men as he sees proper to command in these military districts in the South without our consent?

Mr. DRAKE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion at that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. We cannot as a Congress undertake the execution of the laws; but we can pass new laws which may be made necessary by his failure to execute those already existing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No doubt we can pass new laws; but we can pass no law to execute those that we have already enacted. We cannot compel the President to execute a law we have made if he refuses to execute that law; and there is no remedy that I can see unless it be the remedy provided for in the Constitution, that when the Executive or any other officer fails to execute a law, he shall be arraigned and tried for his delinquency. That is a remedy, I acknowledge; and if it be necessary for Congress to assemble for that purpose, let us understand it. I think it desirable to know exactly what the thing means, and not to have it left in mystery and in doubt. I infer that it means something more than gentlemen are willing to say, because no one who advocates it undertakes to specify any particular reason, or points out any particular danger that is impending; but there is something, some dim and shadowy danger that looms up at some remote distance that we are expected to wait for, to be prepared to meet; and here we remain, dawdling along from day to day, having nothing to do, afraid to do anything; but, like Micawber, waiting for something to turn up, and so we are to pass through the summer. It seems to me, as was suggested by the Senator from Maine, it is not in accordance with the dignity and power and history of the legislative branch of this nation that we should pursue any such course.

Mr. STEWART. If I ever had entertained any doubt in regard to the true course to be pursued on this subject the discussion to-day has certainly removed that doubt. There has been no reason assigned, no contingency suggested, in my opinion, that should bring this Congress together. The principal difficulty that has been suggested is that the laws we have passed on the subject of reconstruction may not be carried into effect. Congress has stated generous, fair, liberal terms of restoration. The charge that Congress was preventing the return of the southern States is now fully answered. It does not lay at the door of Congress or of the Union party. We are for the Union. We have stated generous terms upon which the Union may be restored. The people of the South, the people that desire the South to return to the Union, are as much interested in this as the Union party; the rebels themselves are as much interested in the execution of this law as we are. I think they and the Executive have seen enough not to be desirous of throwing further obstructions in the way of the execution of the will of the loyal people of this country. The door is open, and I do not believe they dare take the responsibility of shutting that door. If they dare, let them take the responsibility. Let him who will obstruct the just restoration which Congress has provided for, and then there will be a cause for action on the part of Congress. But if we stay here without any definite aim or object and waste our strength and bring ourselves into disrepute we may not have the moral support of the country to do those things that will appear to every one to be necessary.

It will take all the time of this vacation to give the people of the South a chance to let these laws go into operation. The registration will take until September, and the conventions will occupy the balance of the time. They can no more than fairly try the experiment by the time we shall return. We shall then have an opportunity to see all they propose to do; and if they do not come up to the spirit of our law the loyal people of this country will demand that further measures shall be taken. We shall then have come fresh from the people. We shall have seen the spirit of the South, who are to act voluntarily to a great extent in this matter. It is not in the hands of the President. He has already appointed these generals. Let him appoint others if he pleases. The duty of these officers is pointed out. They are to make the registration; they are to count votes. If peace is not kept there so that there can be a fair registration; if the rebels in the South propose to disturb the peace and do it, they incur a fearful responsibility, and we shall be here in time to cure it. I believe that if Congress leave here now and return in December, if there has been anything wrong done, we shall have the moral support of the country to rectify that wrong. We are in too good a position to try experiments. Our position is too strong, too just for us to take any chances of doing wrong and getting in a worse position.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to make a motion, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, that we take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Several SENATORS. No, no; let us have a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the vote will be taken on this question, and then we can have a recess.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well; I am willing to withdraw the motion if we can get a vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no sort of feeling in regard to this question of adjournment, and should be willing to fix days when Congress should reassemble between now and December if I could see any public necessity for so doing, or if I thought it was best for the public interests of the country. I have no such fears as some entertain of the President. So far as his acts are concerned I have never withheld the expression of my opinion in condemnation of them when I believed them to be wrong. Of his acts I have always spoken freely, and expect to do so, in condemnation or approval as, in my judgment, they seem to be right or wrong. Personally, of the Executive I do not indulge in remarks. I believe I have never been guilty of making any personal attacks upon the Executive.

I expect the Executive to exercise the functions that belong to his office, and I will no more encroach upon what I believe are his constitutional prerogatives than I will allow him to encroach upon ours. It is his province to convene Congress on extraordinary occasions. That power is vested in him by the Constitution. Congress has no authority to vest it in anybody else, because if it has it takes it from that power where the Constitution has left it, in my judgment.

Now, sir, a resolution came to this body from the House of Representatives proposing that Congress should convene on the first Wednesday of each month, or nearly each month, between now and December, unless the Presiding Officers of the two Houses thought proper to postpone its meeting. I question the authority to pass such a resolution. The committee has been rebuked by the Senator from Nevada and some others for not discharging its duty, because it has not made a report on that question. Why, sir, what was the duty of the committee to which the question of adjournment was referred? To report its views on that subject; and what were they? In favor of a resolution to adjourn, not to the first Wednesday in each month between now and December, but to adjourn the two Houses of Congress, to bring the session to a close in the ordinary mode on Thursday next. It is the first time that I ever heard a committee have not a right to report a substitute for a bill or resolution that was referred to them; and yet my good friend from Nevada is much aggrieved, and he thinks the House of Representatives has a right to feel aggrieved, because the committee have thought proper to report a substitute.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him, I should not have said that if he had not said in advance that they did not consider it. He said, in reply to a question asked by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] that they did not consider the question whether it was constitutional or not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator misunderstands the word "consider." I do not know whether I used the word; but if I did, I meant that we did not go into an examination of the constitutional power to pass the resolution; but we considered the resolution very deliberately and came to the opinion that, constitutional or not, it ought not to be adopted. We preferred a different resolution, believed that the public interest and every other consideration required it.

Mr. NYE. I simply referred to the declaration of the honorable chairman himself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, sir, I say now that it was unnecessary, and not the duty of the committee, in the views it entertained of the proper resolution to report to this body, to enter into any examination of the constitutional power. But, sir, there are difficulties connected with these adjournments. The Senator from Wisconsin has moved a substitute, which is that Congress shall assemble on the first Monday of June, I think—I am not certain about the day—and that then the Presiding Officers of the respective Houses shall then adjourn them unless otherwise ordered. That would be a session of Congress. It will convene at that time. Now, how are we to know whether it will be otherwise ordered or not? He and I live a thousand miles away.

Mr. HOWE. I will tell the Senator how I think we shall know. We shall know by the Journal that will be kept by the Clerk there at that desk. If a quorum of the two Houses meet here and direct otherwise than is proposed in the amendment, it will be entered on that Journal, and there we shall have it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator did not quite understand what I meant. Perhaps, technically, he may have understood correctly what I said. What I mean to say is, how would we know in advance whether there was to be an actual session of Congress or not? The record will show when Congress assembles what is done; but how are we to know a thousand miles away whether it will be our duty to be here or not?

Mr. HOWE. I explained, if the Senator will indulge me, or tried to explain, when I was on the floor before, that each individual Senator and Representative would act on his own judgment, at the time, of the public necessities, and come if he thought the public necessities required it, and stay away if the public necessities did not; and if it happened that a majority of the two Houses convened here believed that the public necessities should require the session there would be a majority here, and they would take measures either to procure the attendance of other members or go on with the session or not as they saw fit.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A majority of one House might assemble and not of the other. A majority of the House of Representatives, having in charge this matter of impeachment which is here alluded to, might come here with a view of presenting articles of impeachment, and a majority of this body might not be here. The result of that would be that an adjournment would take place.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me once more. The amendment that I propose makes it imperative upon the Presiding Officers of the two Houses then to adjourn them unless there be a majority of both Houses, not of one, but both Houses, to otherwise direct and repeal this amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So I understand. That was the precise case I intended to state. Suppose a majority of the House of Representatives come here for the very purpose of preferring articles of impeachment. The Senate is not coming here to impeach. We know nothing about that. We are not going to anticipate that articles will be proposed. We do not investigate that question. We try it when it is presented. What could the House do? If all the members of the House assemble here, according to the Senator's proposition, on the first Monday of June, and there is not a majority of the Senate present, the Presiding Officers would adjourn the House as well as the Senate. They cannot do anything. Does the Senator want to provide that, and leave us all in uncertainty, and not know whether there is to be a session or not? One Senator may think it advisable to come; and the same differences of opinion that we have here will prevail all over the country. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] will be sure to be here, because he sees a cloud in the distance that he is apprehensive may overshadow the land. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] probably will go home, and not be present; and I should come or not, I suppose, as it seemed to me the public necessity required that I should be here. That leaves it all in a state of uncertainty. Are there no other inconveniences? Let me say to my friend from Wisconsin that we have passed a law which declares that—

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death or resignation by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter."

That is the Constitution; but our law provides further:

"If no appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be made to such offices so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid during the next session."

Now, this will be a session of Congress, and it will have to be adjourned, and if no appointment is made then, what then? The office is in abeyance, and any man who undertakes to execute its duties is guilty of a high offense. What will be the result? There is no Senate here to act upon the vacancies that have occurred during the recess of the Senate; the time of the assembling of Congress is arrived by your law; and in contemplation of law Congress is here and adjourned by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses unless it is otherwise ordered by those Houses; and what becomes of all the officers in the land? Where are the commissions of these men filled up during the recess?

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me, I ought to apologize: that is a difficulty that did not occur to me. The resolution amended as I proposed would require the two Houses to assemble at twelve o'clock on the first Monday in June, and to be adjourned at twelve o'clock on the first Monday in June, unless there were a majority of both Houses otherwise to direct. If there is a majority, then there is somebody to act upon these nominations. If there is not a majority here, then it is true that just so many offices as were vacated by death, happening at precisely twelve o'clock on the first Monday in June, could not be filled up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But how would it be as to those that happened after our adjournment on Thursday next until twelve o'clock on the first Monday in June? That is the question. What will be the condition of every office which has been vacated by resignation or death or in any other way from the time we adjourn until you meet on the first Monday in June? They can be filled until that time. But does the Senator from Wisconsin construe his proposition to mean that at precisely twelve o'clock on the first Monday in June Congress shall assemble, and at precisely twelve o'clock it shall be adjourned until the first Monday of December by the Presiding Officers, unless otherwise ordered? Then it is an impossibility otherwise to order, for it has to be done by both Houses; and if the moment it meets it must adjourn, then you must put it an adjournment at once till December; for it would be an impossibility to otherwise order if that is the construction. I suppose the Senator from Wisconsin meant that unless it was otherwise ordered during that day; that is, during the twenty-four hours.

Mr. COLE. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether there is any Congress if there is not a majority or a quorum present?

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is in contemplation of law a Congress. You cannot ascertain that question. It cannot be otherwise ordered unless it is otherwise ordered by a quorum. No action can transpire; and the Presiding Officers are required to adjourn, what? The Congress. That is what they adjourn according to the terms of the proposition offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. The two Houses make the Congress. You will find, sir, that we shall be beset by various difficulties.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask, if I understand him correctly to affirm, or as meaning to affirm, that if less than a quorum of the two Houses meet on the first Monday in June under this amendment there will be a session of the Congress; that that will be a session of the Senate or a session of the House?

Mr. TRUMBULL. In the contemplation of the Constitution as to the expiration of the terms of commissions my opinion is they would expire with that adjournment. When that adjournment was declared by the Presiding Officers that the Congress was adjourned from June until December, I should think that the commissions granted until the end of the next session of the Senate would have ceased to exist, and all the offices would be vacant.

But, Mr. President, I did not intend to occupy time in regard to this matter. I rose chiefly to reply to the suggestion that the committee had transcended its duty in reporting a substitute for the resolution which was committed to it by the Senate. If the Senate think proper to adopt the suggestions that are made by other members of the Senate, very well; but it has seemed to me that the better course would be to adjourn as we ordinarily do. It will take until December to put into operation the laws which we have passed, acting in good faith, and we must afford a reasonable opportunity to do that. I will not assume in advance that the law is not to be executed.

As to the change of commanders suggested by some Senators, that is the constitutional right of the President, and it is no cause for impeachment or anything else that he changes his commanders. He vetoes our bills, some one says. It is a constitutional prerogative belonging to him, and it is no cause for impeachment because he vetoes a bill. That is his right.

Mr. YATES. It may prevent reconstruction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It may prevent reconstruction by the veto of a bill; but it is a perfect right belonging to the Executive to veto a bill if he thinks proper. It may be injudicious; in our opinion it is.

Mr. YATES. And we can pass them over the veto.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, and we have done so, and having done so it becomes his duty to execute the law, which I trust he will do. Whether he will or not, we must, at any rate, afford a reasonable opportunity to the President to see whether he executes it or not. He may change commanders. That we cannot help. It would be no cause of complaint whether we were in session or not.

Now, sir, in my judgment it is better that Congress should adjourn. We shall assemble again—I care not whether it is the 1st of December or the 1st of October—as soon as a fair opportunity shall have been afforded to put these laws into execution. I apprehend that the President, knowing the character of the Congress with which he has to deal, will hardly expect that Congress will be satisfied with a non-execution of these laws, or with his throwing any impediment in the way of their operation.

Mr. HOWE. I would not say another word but for the difficulty which the Senator from Illinois has started in reference to the practical operation of the amendment I have suggested. If I took the view of the law which he seems to take I should certainly vote against my own amendment; but I take a different view. When the Constitution provides that a commission issued by the President in the recess of the Senate shall endure until the expiration of the next session of the Senate, I understand it to mean that it shall endure until a Senate shall have convened and adjourned, and not to mean that it shall endure simply until a Senate shall have had an opportunity to convene, although it may not have done so. I think that must be the meaning of the—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I find that the Constitution provides that—

"A majority of each [House] shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members."

Now, I should like to know, suppose less than a quorum of the Senators should assemble here the first Monday of June, could they not adjourn from day to day? Could not they proceed and compel absent members to attend so as to obtain a quorum; and so in the House?

Mr. HOWE. No, I conceive not very clearly, because here is a law on the statute-book which requires the Presiding Officers of the two Houses to do a particular thing; that is, to adjourn the two Houses at that day; and less than a quorum of the two Houses could no more control that than they could repeal any other statute on the book.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOWE and Mr. DRAKE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Howe, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, and Riddle—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the amendment by inserting at the end thereof "to meet again on the first Wednesday of November." I am in favor of an earlier meeting than the committee propose, but not in favor of this "hop, skip, and jump," "now you see it, and now you don't" kind of an adjournment. I believe the business of the country requires us on all occasions to adjourn to meet at an earlier period than the first Monday of December. In the short sessions we have but about two and a half months for the discharge of all our legislative duties. If we meet a month earlier we shall have more time at the short session and at the long session. I believe it would be much preferable to have the month of November for business in preference to the months of June, July, or August.

When the time for the meeting of Congress was fixed on the first Monday of December, it was when we had but thirteen States; we now have thirty-six. It was when we had but five or six million people; we now have between thirty and forty millions. It therefore is no more than reasonable to suppose that we require a longer period than we have hitherto had in order to accomplish all of our legitimate duties. I hope that an earlier day of reassembling than December will be fixed upon by the Senate, not only for the next session, but hereafter and forever.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cole, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, and Riddle—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by adding to it:

Provided, That the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives may by joint proclamation, at any time before the first Monday of December, convene the two Houses of Congress for the transaction of business if in their opinion the public interests require.

It will be observed that that is a different proposition from the one which comes to us from the House of Representatives. It proceeds on the idea that the two Houses of Congress may in advance commit to their respective Presiding Officers the power of convening Congress. On the subject of convening Congress the Constitution expresses itself as follows:

"The President may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them; and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper."

Now, under these words it is very evident that the President has power to convene Congress in his discretion, and we know historically that he has exercised that power. The question now occurs whether that is the only way in which Congress may be convened. I submit that Congress, in a certain sense, is under the Constitution a self-regulating machine, and that it may in advance determine how it will come together, where, and when.

According to the proposition I have offered Congress may be brought together at any time between now and next December on a joint proclamation of the two Presiding Officers. It seems to me that this proposition is very simple; it is easy to be carried out; it is not as complicated in its form as that which has come from the other House; it has in it nothing of the skip and jump character which my friend from Vermont did not like in the House proposition. It is direct. It assumes that there may be a recess of the two Houses until next December, unless the two Presiding Officers, in whom we have such confidence, shall by joint proclamation call us together.

Now, I am unwilling to doubt that Congress may authorize their officers to do that. I cannot doubt it. Assuming that we have the power, is not this an occasion to exercise it? I do not wish to be carried into the general debate. I had intended to say something about it; but it is late. I had intended to say something in reply to the Senator from Maine, for there was hardly a sentence in what he said from beginning to end that did not seem to me to justify comment. I differ from him entirely, radically let me say, in his views on the question of adjournment. But I will not take any time now to go over the ground which has already been traversed by other Senators. My colleague [Mr. WILSON] suggests plowed and harrowed. I may add also, gleaned. I will not, therefore, go into the general question except to make one remark: I do think Congress ought to do something; we ought not to adjourn as on ordinary occasions, for this is not an ordinary occasion, and there is the precise beginning of the difference between myself and the Senator from Maine, and also between myself and the Senator from Illinois.

The Senator from Illinois said why not, as on ordinary occasions, now go home? Ay, sir, that is the very question: is this an ordinary occasion? To my mind it clearly is not. It is an extraordinary occasion, big with the fate of this Republic. The Senator from Maine reminds me that I am going to glean a second time. I have said very little, not quarter as much as my friend from Maine. I know I have not said it as well as he has said what he had to say. However, I wish to drive home, if I may say so, the single point that at this moment we are bound to do something; we cannot adjourn as if this were an ordinary occasion. I might develop that; I might present to you my views of the extraordinary circumstances of this time, and our duties growing out of the character of the Chief Magistrate. I did that in a very general way the other evening, when the subject was under discussion before. I am not going into it now. I hope, however, that the Senate will be disposed to adopt the proposition which I have offered. I submit that it is a proposition of reconciliation, if I may so express myself, between conflicting opinions; a compromise, if you please. It does not require Congress to come together; but it leaves in the hands of trusty agents of Congress the power of bringing us together if the public interest require.

Mr. MORTON. The proposition submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to invest the President of this body and the Speaker of the House of Representatives with the power to call an extra session of Congress. That power is clearly vested by the Constitution in the President of the United States, nor can we, in my opinion, make the question of the length of an adjournment or the length of a recess to depend upon the action of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or any other person. An adjournment is a legislative act, as much so as the passage of a bankrupt bill, and we can no more put the solution of that question into the hands of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives than we could appoint a committee to draft a bankrupt bill, and provide that their act should be a law. An adjournment must depend upon the action of the two Houses themselves. I am equally clear, however, that an adjournment over to the first Monday in December is too long. I am quite clear in the conviction that Congress ought to meet sooner than the first Monday in December. I think we ought to adjourn to meet at an earlier period in the fall.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Drake, Harlan, Howe, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Riddle, and Saulsbury—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I want to try one amendment at the other end of the resolution. I move to amend it by striking out "Thursday, the 28th," and inserting "Friday, the 29th." I believe that is within the constitutional power of Congress, and I feel bound, in view of what has been said, to explain that this proposed amendment has not the slightest reference to the question of impeachment. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted. It will keep the business community of the country agitated for twenty-four hours more. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not accommodate me so much for a moment as to withdraw his amendment to let me offer another which I have prepared?

Mr. HOWE. Is mine inconsistent with yours?

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to offer an amendment by way of substitute for the whole proposition.

Mr. HOWE. That can be moved afterward just as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee by striking out all after the word "that" in the first line and inserting:

On Thursday, the 28th day of March, instant, at the hour of twelve o'clock noon, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn their respective Houses over until Wednesday, the 5th day of June next, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, those officers shall further adjourn the said Houses, respectively, over until Wednesday, the 4th day of September next, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, they shall further adjourn the said Houses over, respectively, until the first Monday of December next.

I call for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Howe, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, and Yates—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Riddle, and Saulsbury—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to say that on this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. NORTON.] If he were present he would vote in the affirmative and I in the negative.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, and Saulsbury—15.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 63) to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) concerning the uniform of persons in the diplomatic service of the United States; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) to cover certain moneys in the control of the Navy Department into the Treasury, were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river, for military, naval, and commercial purposes, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 44) relating to the sale of the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 42) authorizing the employment of Brevet Brigadier General Seth Eastman on special service was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) in regard to the Rancho Panoche Grande claim in California, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress, was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have now, so far as we are concerned, voted to adjourn on the day after to-morrow. There is a good deal of executive business on the table that ought to be attended to, and I move that the Senate now take a recess until half past seven o'clock for the purpose of then considering executive business; it is now half past five.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am afraid the country will be agitated if we meet again this evening. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—yeas 11, noes 20.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate take a recess till half past seven o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Had we not better go into executive session now, have the messages read and referred, and adjourn until to-morrow, and then take the day for executive business. What shall we gain by coming here to-night?

Mr. FESSENDEN. We can settle some cases.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is not much on the executive Calendar. I can refer the messages and receive whatever reports are ready to be made, and then to-morrow come here and take the day.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes; go into executive session at one o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a matter of entire indifference to me. I want to get ahead with business; but if the Senate prefer to go into executive session now very well. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 26, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is desirable that the public property at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, used previous to the rebellion for an armory, be turned to useful account;

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be directed to examine the title papers concerning that property, and report his opinion as to the title of the United States to the same, whether it is in fee-simple or merely held in trust by the President for a specific use and no other.

HARBOR IN WISCONSIN AND MICHIGAN.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, submitted a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for improving the harbor at the mouth of Menomonee river, between the States of Wisconsin and Michigan; which was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations when appointed, and printed.

SURROGATE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to create the office of surrogate of the District of Columbia, to provide for the appointment and define the powers and duties of guardians, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DOORKEEPER'S MESSENGERS.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I also ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized and directed to retain during the recess of Congress the number of messengers now employed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object; this has not been usual heretofore.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Allow me to explain a moment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object.

TAXING UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House the bonds and other securities issued by the United States, which are by law exempt from State and municipal taxation, ought to be taxed by the authority of Congress for national purposes in such manner and to such extent as may be necessary to substantially equalize taxation, taking into consideration the average tax imposed upon other property for local purposes in the several States, such bonds and other securities not being exempt by any provision of law from such taxation; and that the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed, be instructed to report a bill providing for such equalization of taxation.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object to the resolution unless it is for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not designed for reference. I will not move to suspend the rules, for I have promised the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] who is interested in a subject pending at the adjournment yesterday, that I would not now take up the time of the House by moving to suspend the rules for the purpose of having this resolution now considered.

CHARLES GRAFTON PAGE.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize Charles Grafton Page to apply for and receive a patent for his electrical apparatus and circuit breakers, known as the "Induction Coil," which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Patents when appointed.

Mr. MYERS. I move that this bill be printed; and I also ask leave to have printed with this bill a report directed to be made by the Committee on Patents to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, but which, the committee not having been called after the report was prepared, was not presented to that Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

TESTIMONY AFFECTING A SENATOR.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask leave to submit a resolution, which in substance is the same I offered on yesterday. I have shown it to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HULBURD,] and he consents to its being adopted by the House. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and is hereby, instructed to make and certify a copy of the testimony of David A. Hull taken before the Committee on Public Expenditures in its investigation of the New York custom-house fraud, and deliver the same so certified to Senator PATTERSON, of Tennessee; and said committee is hereby authorized to allow the Clerk the opportunity to make said copy of said testimony.

No objection was made; and the resolution was agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE OF WILLIAM F. SWITZLER.

Mr. BENJAMIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with copies of any and all correspondence in his possession between Captain William F. Switzler, late provost marshal of the ninth district of Missouri, and the Provost Marshal's Bureau, in relation to the loyalty and disloyalty of the people of said ninth district or any portion thereof.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to repeal a part of section ten of an act entitled "An act to amend the existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that the compensation allowed to members of Congress by an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, and the several acts and joint resolutions amendatory thereof, shall be paid in the manner following, namely, on the first day of the first session of each Congress, or as soon thereafter as he may be in attendance and apply, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, shall receive his mileage as now provided by law, and all his compensation from the beginning of his term to be computed at the rate of $5,000 per year; and thereafter during the said session, and during the ensuing adjournment, compensation at the same rate shall be paid monthly upon the order of the Senator, Member, or Delegate entitled thereto; and on the first day of the second or any subsequent session he shall receive his mileage as now provided by law, and during the said session and the subsequent adjournment compensation at the same rate; provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal the existing provision of law, that no mileage shall be paid for attendance at the first session of any Congress to members of the immediately preceding Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. This seems to be quite a complicated measure, and I think we should understand it better than now before acting upon it.

Mr. DONNELLY. It changes the present law in only one particular; enabling members to draw their compensation after the first organization of Congress monthly, and at their homes, in the same way that they do here while in attendance upon an actual session. As the law now stands, should Congress adjourn today until December next, we cannot draw during the recess any part of our compensation, but it will accumulate and be paid to us in December next upon our return here. That law, as it now stands, arises from the fact that heretofore the first organization of Congress has taken place in the December following the beginning of the term. But the organization of Congress now takes place on the first day of the actual term.

There is no reason why members should be subjected to the inconvenience of waiting until the end of the recess to receive their compensation actually earned and due to them. I have conferred on this subject with the Sergeant-at-Arms and with a number of members. I trust that with this explanation there will be no objection to acting upon the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. UPSON. I do not object to the introduction of the resolution for reference; but I must object to its consideration at the present time.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move then that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROOKS. If I understand the resolution, it provides that there shall be a mileage for each additional session.

Mr. DONNELLY. Not at all; the resolution does not propose to change the compensation in any respect either as to annual salary or mileage.

Mr. BROOKS. I suppose that under the resolution passed yesterday we are to have a session beginning in May, another in June, another in September, another in November; making altogether six or seven sessions or more for the Congress, for which I understand there will be six or seven mileages.

Mr. DONNELLY. Not at all; I do not so understand it.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand it so.

Mr. DONNELLY. The resolution would have no such effect.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker, who is required to certify to the mileage accounts, will state that he does not propose to certify more than two mileages for each member during the entire Congress, unless the law should be changed.

Mr. BROOKS. The resolution of yesterday proposes to change the law.

Mr. DONNELLY. This resolution does not propose any change with regard to compensation.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL DAVID THOMPSON.

Mr. MUNGEN asked unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel David Thompson.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to cause the date of the pension certificate of Lieutenant Colonel David Thompson, late of the eighty-second regiment Ohio veteran volunteer infantry, to be changed from the 15th day of January, 1867, to the 15th day of May, 1865, the day upon which Colonel Thompson was wounded, and that he be paid accordingly.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I object to the introduction of this resolution unless it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. MUNGEN. I consent to that. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when appointed.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when appointed.

RETIRING OF TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution relative to the retiring of Treasury notes.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, provides that the Treasury notes authorized to be issued under the act of Congress of June 20, 1864, including the $50,000,000 authorized to be issued for a temporary loan, not more than $4,000,000 shall be retired in any one month.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If I were permitted to make a brief explanation—

Mr. BROOMALL. If the resolution is to be introduced for reference I have no objection. I object to legislation on this subject at the present time.

SHIP-CANAL AROUND FALLS OF THE OHIO.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at the present time a joint resolution providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes. This resolution contains no appropriation whatever. It merely supplies an omission made by the committee in reporting the river and harbor improvement bill.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to cause surveys, with plans and estimates of cost, to be made by an officer of engineers for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river, on the Indiana side thereof, of suitable location and dimensions for military, naval, and commercial purposes; and also to cause such officer to estimate the expense of completing the Louisville and Portland canal, on the Kentucky side of said falls, according to the plan on which the said canal company is now progressing with said work; and that the expense of both be defrayed from the sums appropriated in the acts of June 23, 1866, and March 2, 1867, for examination and surveys relating the improvement of harbors and rivers on the northwestern lakes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not rise to make objection, but I suppose it will be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it makes an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. If unanimous consent be granted it will be considered in the House.

Mr. ROSS. Does the bill make an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does. It is to be taken out of money already appropriated in the river and harbor bill.

The bill was introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EGGLESTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BREVET BRIGADIER GENERAL SETH EASTMAN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution, agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs of the last Congress, but which was objected to when we endeavored to get it in by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] who since then has become satisfied it ought to pass. If there be no objection, I will make a brief explanation.

There was no objection.

The Clerk then read a joint resolution authorizing the employment of Brevet Brigadier General Seth Eastman in the decoration of the Capitol.

It provides if the President shall deem it proper to assign Brevet Brigadier General Seth Eastman, of the United States Army, now on the retired list, to duty, so as to entitle him to the full pay, emoluments, and allowances of his lineal rank, that it shall be competent to have such duty consist in the employment of the said officer in the execution, under the supervision of the architect of the Capitol, of paintings from his own designs for the decoration of the rooms of the Committees on Indian Affairs and on Military Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives and other parts of the Capitol; and no additional compensation for such service is to be paid to said Eastman beyond his pay, allowances, and emoluments as an officer as aforesaid.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe I was one of the persons who objected to that resolution when it was up before. I have since learned it is important it should pass, and I withdraw any objection on my part.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have been paying for decorations, some displaying good taste and others of tawdry character, a great deal of money to Italian artists and others, while we have American talent much more competent for the work. Among others possessing native talent is General Eastman, who is now lieutenant colonel in the regular Army and a brevet brigadier general. He is more of an artist in all that relates to the Indians, except possibly Catlin and Stanley, than any we have had in this country. He is disabled from doing full duty now and is on the retired list, suffering from rheumatism occasioned by exposure in the field on active duty. The General of the Army is perfectly willing to have Congress, if they think proper, provide for detailing General Eastman for this duty of executing for the Capitol some of his magnificent paintings. It is not military duty, and it is thought better the General should be authorized to assign him to this duty.

If assigned to this duty General Eastman will draw his full pay as lieutenant colonel, instead of as on the retired list, making a difference of about $1,200 or $1,500 a year. For at the most $1,500 a year we will secure service for which we have been paying tens of thousands of dollars to foreign artists, and we will get better work done. I think under the circumstances a gallant American officer who has taste and artistic ability should be permitted to be assigned to this duty. I invite members to look at a book I have here of engravings from his paintings, which display everything that is elegant and tasteful in art.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS OF WAR OF 1812.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will make a statement to the House. Yesterday the House referred a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in reference to pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when appointed. The Chair had a conference with the chairman of that committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and who will probably be the chairman of the committee in the Fortieth Congress, and he stated that committee was overworked, and suggested that the subject should be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, which has very little to do. If there be no objection that reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged that several years will be required to pay soldiers the bounties already provided by law at the present rate of payment, and also that the present number of paymasters assigned for that purpose could make payments much faster than they now are made, but are delayed because information cannot be furnished from the office of the Second Auditor as fast as required, owing to a want of sufficient clerical force in said office: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to secure the prompt payment of bounties due to soldiers under the law.

SURVEY OF ILLINOIS RIVER.

Mr. JUDD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to send the report of Brevet Major General J. H. Wilson, upon the survey and examination of the Illinois river, if not presented to the House prior to its adjournment, to the Congressional Printer, and that the same be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a similar resolution has already passed.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to explain it for one moment. The House has adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of War to furnish that report. I am advised at the Department that it cannot probably be furnished to the House before the close of this session, and this resolution is simply a direction to have it printed if it is not furnished before the present session is ended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman wishes to have it printed during the recess?

Mr. JUDD. Yes, sir.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JUDD. I ask leave to offer the following additional resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of Brevet Major General J. H. Wilson, of the survey and examination of the Illinois river, when presented, two thousand extra copies for the use of the House, and five hundred for the use of the Bureau of Engineers.

The SPEAKER. That resolution goes to the Committee on Printing under the law.

MAIL CONTRACTORS ON THE PACIFIC.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask leave to submit for present action a joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to secure to mail contractors in the Pacific States and Territories the payment of their contract pay at San Francisco, California.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the Postmaster General shall designate a special agent for the Pacific States and Territories to audit and adjust the accounts of mail contractors in said States and Territories, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Postmaster General, so as to secure payment in San Francisco.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. ALLISON objected.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to make a word of explanation. The present mail contractors have to obtain their money upon certificates of the postmasters by whose offices their routes pass. It frequently occurs that their certificates are erroneous and have to be sent back, so that the contractors have to lie out of their money sometimes for fifteen months. This simply authorizes the payment of the claims under the direction of the Postmaster General.

Mr. ALLISON. I call attention to the fact that these accounts have to be audited by the Treasury Department. I have no objection to referring this to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MALLORY. I will consent to that.

The joint resolution was accordingly ordered to be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads when appointed.

LONG ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I now call for the regular order.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the regular order, which was the unfinished business at the adjournment last evening, being Senate bill No. 68, to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, for military purposes.

The bill was reported. It authorizes the Secretary of War to take possession of that portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, Massachusetts, belonging to James T. Austin, for the purpose of erecting a fort and such other structures as may be needed for military purposes, and to pay for the same $5,000 as agreed upon; provided that this sum shall not be paid until the Attorney General of the United States is satisfied that the title has been fully transferred to the United States free from all incumbrances, and that the person receiving the money is competent to act in the premises.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The sole object of this bill is to facilitate the transfer of this property to the United States, where a fortification is now being built. It is to meet the difficulty of the fact that the fee is in a gentleman who is not competent to give a deed to the satisfaction of the district attorney. This is to carry out an amicable arrangement made upon the recommendation of the district attorney for the purchase of this land.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire how it happens that we commence to build a fort upon a piece of land that we do not own, and then ask the Government to purchase it? My objection is not specific as to this particular measure, and it is general against making this kind of investments. I have no doubt this tract of land would be a good investment. But my constituents are investing what spare means they have further West, and do not care particularly about purchasing land in Boston. There has been no attack made upon Boston for a great number of years, and I do not think there is any danger of an attack for many years in the future. I do not think we should buy any more Boston land or construct any more forts there.

Mr. ALLISON. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The question was taken; and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The bill was accordingly considered in the House, read a first, second, and third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask leave to make a personal explanation, which will occupy the attention of the House but a few moments.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask how much time the gentleman wants?

Mr. BUTLER. Fifteen minutes will do.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have caused to be laid upon the table of each member a copy, as reported in the official journal of the House, of the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] the other day in reply to me. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that that speech as published contains double the amount of matter which the official reporters furnished; and also that almost one half of the words contained in the original official report are erased. Now, I understand the rule to be, that in any debate personal to a member, no such change can be made properly without the consent of the member to be affected thereby. But what I particularly desire to call the attention of the House to is this: that a change is made in the report which takes the shape of a direct attack upon me to which I could make no reply. The new matter is as follows:

"The gentleman denounces me as having executed an innocent person without evidence. I have executed no person, but acted as the advocate of the United States on the trial of persons who were charged with and convicted of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. The gentleman pronounces, with the assurance of Sir Oracle, that an innocent woman was on that trial convicted without sufficient evidence. By what right does the gentleman thus assail me, or the tribunals of true and brave and honorable men, who found the facts upon their oaths, and pronounced the judgment? What does the gentleman know of the evidence in the case, and what does he care for the evidence when he thus assails the official conduct of those men who constituted the court?"

Now, with the leave of the House, I do not desire to make any characterization by use of epithets of such a change. That even in the heat and ardor of debate we may throw off expressions which upon reflection we would a little rather had not been said, it is most true, may be, and should be changed in the official report. I may do so myself. But he who in the cool hour of the silent night sits down and deliberately pens an accusation against his peer to which he cannot reply is not to be envied.

Therefore I ask leave now to state the evidence upon which I made the assertion I did the other day, that Mrs. Surratt was improperly convicted; because the gentleman says that I neither knew nor cared for the evidence. I hold in my hand the evidence as reported under the gentleman's official sanction. I examined it with great care long ago. The statement I made the other day was not sporadic thought with me; it was the result of a careful examination of this case for another and a different purpose, in the endeavor to ascertain who was concerned in fact in the great conspiracy to assassinate President Lincoln.

The gentleman says he was "the advocate of the United States only." Sir, he makes a wide mistake as to his official position. He was the special judge advocate whose duty it was to protect the rights of the prisoner as well as the rights of the United States, and to sum up the evidence and state the law as would a judge on the bench. Certainly it was his duty to present to the commission all the evidence bearing upon the case.

Now, there was a piece of evidence within the knowledge of the special judge advocate and in his possession which he did not produce on this most momentous trial. When Booth was captured by the force under Lieutenant Colonel Conger there was taken from his pocket a diary like the one I now hold in my hand. In this diary Booth had set down day by day his plans, his thoughts, his motives, and the execution of his plans. That diary came into the possession of the Government, but it was not brought before the military commission. Although even Booth's tobacco-pipe, spur, and compass, found in the same pocket with the diary, were put in evidence, the diary was not produced. That diary has been before your Committee on the Judiciary. Let me say here, to exclude conclusions, that I do not obtain my evidence from them. That diary, as now produced, has eighteen pages cut out, the pages prior to the time when Abraham Lincoln was massacred, although the edges as yet show they had all been written over. Now, what I want to know is this: was that diary whole when it came into the hands of the Government? And second, if it was good judgment on the part of the gentleman prosecuting the assassins of the President to put in evidence the tobacco-pipe which was found in Booth's pocket, why was not the diary, in his own handwriting, put in evidence, and wherein he himself had detailed the particulars of that crime?

And therefore I did not charge the able and gallant soldiers who sat on that court with having done any wrong. They did not see the diary. They did not know of the diary. If they had they might have given a different finding upon the matter of this great conspiracy.

Who spoliated that book? Who suppressed that evidence? Who caused an innocent woman to be hung when he had in his pocket the diary which had stated at least what was the idea and the purpose of the main conspirator in the case? There is still remaining in that diary a most remarkable sentence, written apparently but a few hours before Booth died. I give it from memory:

"I have endeavored to cross the Potomac five times, but failed. I propose to return to Washington and give myself up, and clear myself from this great crime."

How clear himself? By disclosing his accomplices? Who were they? Who spoliated that book after it got into the possession of the Government, if it was not spoliated before? And what evidence is there that it was spoliated before?

Why was not Lieutenant Colonel Conger allowed to state fully in regard to this matter? Let me read from the reported evidence on the trial. It will be seen that the questions were carefully put, so that Conger when on the witness-stand should not tell about that book. He says:

"I then took what things were in his pockets and tied them up in a piece of paper. He was not then quite dead. He would—once perhaps in five minutes—gasped; his heart would almost die out, and then it would commence again, and by a few rapid beats would make a slight motion. I left the body and the prisoner Herold in charge of Lieutenant Baker. I told him to wait an hour if Booth was not dead; if he recovered to wait there, and send over to Belle Plain for a surgeon from one of the gun-ships, and if he died in the space of an hour to get the best conveyance he could and bring him on."

"[A knife, pair of pistols, belt, holster, file, pocket compass, spur, pipe, carbine, cartridges, and bills of exchange were shown to the witness.]"

"That is the knife, bolt, and holster taken from Booth; the pistols I did not examine with any care; but they looked like these; that is the pocket-compass, with the candle-grease on it, just as we found it; the spur I turned over to Mr. Stanton; and I judge this to be the one taken from Booth. That is the carbine we took; it is a Spencer rifle, and has a mark on the breech by which I know it; both the pistols and carbine were loaded. I unloaded the carbine myself in Mr. Secretary Stanton's office, and these are the cartridges that I took out; there was one in the barrel and the chamber was full; these are the bills of exchange; I put my initials on them."

"I had seen John Wilkes Booth in Washington, and recognized the man who was killed as the same; I had before remarked his resemblance to his brother, Edwin Booth, whom I had often seen play."

It will be seen that there was no point where the witness was asked, "Were those things all that you took from Booth's pockets?" Certain articles were spread out before the witness, even to a tobacco-pipe, and he was asked, "Did you take this?" "Did you take that?" He answered, "Yes." But if the proper question had been asked he would have answered, "Yes; and I took the diary of Booth from his person; it was not necessary that I should know anything about him from his resemblance to his brother, Edwin Booth, in order to recognize him, because I took this diary in his own handwriting from his own breast as he lay there gasping in the agonies of death." That would have been an identification beyond all question and all peradventure.

Now, sir, I do not know what would have been the judgment of that military commission if that evidence found upon the person of the prisoner had been produced; and that evidence ought, in my judgment, to have been produced. I will state here (because I wish to deal fairly and justly with this case; I have no feeling, no heat in regard to it) that I understand the theory to be that that evidence was not produced lest Booth's glorification of himself, as found in his diary, should go before the country. I think that a lame excuse. If an assassin can glorify himself, let him do so. No harm could result from it in the minds of a patriotic and intelligent people. Therefore, I again ask, Why was a most remarkable piece of evidence, which was found on the body of the great conspirator, concealed? No, I will take that back; I will not say "concealed;" but why was it not brought forward on that trial? Why was it not brought to the knowledge of the public mind? I believe that piece of evidence would have shown what the whole case, in my judgment, now shows: that up to a certain hour Booth contemplated capture and abduction, and that he afterward changed his purpose to assassination on consultation with the conspirators about him.

Mrs. Surratt may or may not have known of that change of purpose from abduction to assassination. Now, what I find fault with in the judge advocate, who did not sum up for the prisoner, is that in his very able and very bitter argument against the prisoners no notice is taken by the special judge advocate of this change of purpose and brought to the attention of the men who composed that military tribunal. And if Mrs. Surratt did not know of this change of purpose there is no evidence that she knew in any way of the assassination, and ought not, in my judgment, to have been convicted of taking part in it.

Mr. Speaker, these are briefly some of the reasons why in my former remarks I said "I am glad the blood of that woman, be she guilty or innocent, is not upon my head." But in no manner, in no way, by no intendment or word of mine, did I mean to say that those able and discreet officers, military men who relied for the law of the case upon the special judge advocate, and who thought they had all the facts which could throw light upon the case, but before whom all the facts were not put, did any wrong whatever—I do not mean to say they judged wrongly under the lights they had. But the point I make, and the point which shall stand made before this country, is that all the testimony possible to throw light on that case was not before that tribunal; for if we had only the advantage of all the testimony, Mr. Speaker, we might then have been able, with the testimony of witnesses fresh in mind, to find who, indeed, were all the accomplices of Booth; to find who it was that changed Booth's purpose from capture to assassination; who it was that could profit by assassination who could not profit by capture and abduction of the President; who it was expected by Booth would succeed to Lincoln if the knife made a vacancy, which we cannot do now but might have done if we could ascertain what was in that book. Although in some aspects of the case it might not have been legal evidence, yet in all aspects it is moral evidence, carrying conviction to the moral sense. It is the dying declaration of a man, assassin though he be, who was speaking the truth, probably to himself, as between himself and his God.

If we had all the pages we should have had some explanation of this great fact: how was Booth to clear himself by going back to Washington from the great crime he had committed? That Booth thought he could do so appears from what still remains; the other eighteen pages are gone. Were they gone when the book came into the possession of the learned judge advocate? If they were, why did not he inquire when and where they went? When Lieutenant Colonel Conger gave it to some one, why did he not inquire "Was it whole then?" When it went into the hands of the next man was it whole then? Whose was the knife that cut out the leaves in a way that is plain to be seen of all men?

I am not now speaking of anything which is mere hearsay, but of that which I know. I am speaking of that in which, if I speak wrongly, any gentleman of the Judiciary Committee who has had this book before him can correct me. Again, I take leave to say I am not speaking of any knowledge got from them, because they properly keep it to themselves.

Now, sir, I should not have further pursued this matter except that the gentleman charged me with having made my statement without evidence, without examination of the evidence. He has chosen to bring this matter here by that charge, and I desire now in some form this matter shall be fully and thoroughly investigated, so that all the facts may be brought before the House and the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROSS. I move that his time be extended.

Objection was made.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to make a reply to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman ask for?

Mr. BINGHAM. The length of time taken by my opponent and accuser.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire, if the gentleman has the book to which he refers, he will have goodness enough to send it to me?

Mr. BUTLER. Is this the book you desire?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; I mean the diary of Booth—not a report of the trial.

Mr. BUTLER. The diary? Oh no, sir. They do not let me see it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh yes, sir; that is another exhibition of fairness and manliness.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not it, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman has not got it, he ought not to have said anything about it. Why talk of written evidence and not be able to produce it?

Mr. BUTLER. But then I know who has.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, I do not; that is the difference.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the report which was made of the hurried and excited debate which took place between myself and the gentleman, and which was provoked on his part by an unjust imputation unwarranted by all parliamentary proceedings, none the less unjust and disreputable because he selected the softest words in the language, was very imperfect except the first paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The word "disreputable" is not proper.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is not proper?

The SPEAKER. The word "disreputable."

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg pardon. I suppose that to speak of an unjust accusation as disreputable is parliamentary.

The SPEAKER. To characterize the language of a member as disreputable is not parliamentary.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am only sorry the Speaker did not discover that like words in my accuser's harangue were not also unparliamentary. I take back the word under the direction of the Speaker, and stand corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will speak in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg to say that in my former reply to the gentleman, made under the excitement arising from a sense of wrong done me, and the limitation of my time, it so happened that the report sent to me was the most imperfect, as before stated, that has ever been submitted to me of my remarks made in this House. I therefore revised the report, as was my right, and of this the gentleman complains, and in his sore distress reprints the imperfect report, with errors in it patent to every man who heard me, and lays it on the tables of members. That is beyond question a heroic and magnanimous achievement! Sir, I say that any gentleman may examine the report in the Globe as revised by me with what care he pleases, and he will fail to find in my corrected remarks as therein published a single accusation against the gentleman that is not, by express words or by necessary implication, in the notes of the reporters. The remarks as revised and published are substantially and almost literally what I said on this floor.

I charged that the gentleman constituted himself an unjust accuser. I charged him with having assailed my official conduct upon this floor and elsewhere. I charged him also with having assailed the official conduct of men who were his peers in the field, who stood amid the blackness and tempest of the great conflict, where the earthquake and the fire led the charge. Those words I used that day, and I repeat them now, although they did not appear in precisely that form in the official report sent to me. And yet the gentleman is driven to such straits as I have named, after making this assault on me, simply because I do not choose to follow him and levy charities by confiscation upon a conquered people. He chooses to try to get out of the difficulty into which he has put himself by getting up this mutilated report of my remarks and printing it. The gentleman is welcome to all that he can make by any such course of procedure, and there I leave him, with the additional remark that even in the meager reports of the daily papers on the following morning is found substantially every statement that is recorded in the corrected report in the Globe, even down to the last words I uttered, which they did me the kindness to preserve, and which are, "I defy the gentleman's calumny."

What, then, is the gentleman complaining of? Why, that I said he had condemned without knowing or caring for the evidence. I say it yet. And, sir, if he is the lawyer he is reputed to be—and I am not the man to underrate my adversary here or anywhere—he is to be pitied, coming here and arraigning his peers again for not consenting to admit as testimony for the defense the declarations of any man accused made after the fact. The gentleman puts his book into his pocket. I tell him that I defy him, by any investigation that he dare institute, here or anywhere, to show that any communication came to my hands that appeared or purported to be the production of J. Wilkes Booth that was not made after the fact, long after the fact. Is any lawyer in America or in England to be told that the words and declarations of an accused felon, made after the fact, are evidence that the advocate for the Government is bound to admit on behalf of the accused in any court? Why, sir, if one of several conspirators can thus make his declarations, made after the fact evidence, either for himself or for his coconspirators, how impotent is justice itself!

Sir, I treat with contempt and scorn any intimation from any quarter that I or my associate counsel were under obligations to admit any such evidence. The law does not require it; the common law, the growth of centuries, the gathered wisdom of a thousand years excludes it. But perhaps that great monument of wisdom and learning is not equal to the incomparable genius of the incomparable hero of Fort Fisher. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman give way a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; the gentleman has no right to ask favors at my hands. One word more; I beg leave to say I never saw any memorandum of any kind of John Wilkes Booth or any writing indicating, if I understood at all the gentleman's remarks, any plan by which he was to carry out his projected conspiracy. I never saw any such thing. That is my answer to that. If anybody else saw it, then let whoever else saw it answer for it. I never saw any such thing. And I am not surprised that the gentleman would not let me see the book that he put into his pocket.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I think—

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield, and must be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not care, if having refused to let me inspect the book, he imitates the example given in the vision in the Apocalypse, and "eats it." [Laughter.]

One word more. The gentleman talks about the spoliated book. "Who spoliated the book?" That is about as interesting a cry as that to which I referred the other day, "Who Killed Cock Robin?" Who knows that it was spoliated or mutilated, if that is the gentleman's meaning? If John Wilkes Booth tore pages out of it, was that spoliation or mutilation? The gentleman's words are as impotent as they are unwarranted.

"Let the galled jade wince; our withers are unwrung."

I challenge the gentleman, I dare him here or anywhere in this tribunal, or in any tribunal, to assert that I spoliated or mutilated any book. Why, sir, such a charge, without one tittle of evidence, is only fit to come from a man who lives in a bottle and is fed with a spoon. [Laughter and applause, checked by the Speaker.]

One word to show the heartless maliciousness of this assault, if that be parliamentary. I have great respect for the Speaker of this House personally, as well as for his entire fairness; and if anything said by me in the heat and excitement of this moment even colorably reflects upon the Speaker, I ask that the reporter shall record in the debates and proceedings of this House that I recall and disclaim any such purpose or any such intention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did reflect in some of his remarks upon the Speaker.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg the pardon of the Chair; I had no such intention. I believe a more impartial Presiding Officer never sat since the Commons first met.

Now, what is the other statement made here, showing the utter maliciousness of this accusation, the utter disregard and contempt for all decency and all law? What is it? Why, that I controlled the rulings in the court. The gentleman says he has the record. He is not unlearned in the law—for, as I said before, I do not underrate my adversary—and he knows I was not the official recorder of that court nor its presiding judge advocate. He knows its recorder was the Judge Advocate General of the United States; he knows that he presided during every minute and every hour of its session; he knows that he was its legal adviser. What then? Why, I am to be held at fault; and why? Because I did not overrule the official recorder of the court. Having said this, allow me to say further that the Judge Advocate General did his duty faithfully and is above reproach.

Now, if the gentleman seeks to condemn me for anything said in the argument on that trial, which I admit I made, and every word of which is my own and that of no other man; if the gentleman seeks to condemn me for anything uttered by me in that argument, let him read from the passage and show to this House and to the world wherein I did injustice to any man or to any person connected either directly or indirectly with that trial. Sir, the gentleman has undertaken a task entirely beyond his powers. And he only proves in that which he has undertaken to-day that the execution of the war on his part in this instance, as in others, is by no means up to the high and sounding manifesto.

I repeat, when he again accuses me, and before he asks that I shall be condemned for any part which I performed upon that trial, let him point to any utterance or act of mine which justifies such condemnation.

What is this matter to which the gentleman refers in reference to a change of plan? Why, it was exhibited in evidence on that trial that the original plan, as falsely alleged by the conspirators, was to kidnap, not to assassinate. And the gentleman says, "Poor Mrs. Surratt did not know it." Sir, I remember the maxim which even the pagan observed, to speak nothing of the dead but that which is good; and therefore I am not to be driven by anything which the gentleman may have said, or anything he can say, to utter one single word now in the way of argument as to the guilt of Mrs. Surratt. There is the evidence; and when the gentleman chooses again to assail me let him read my argument upon that subject, and let him answer it. Let him show wherein it is false; let him show wherein it is corrupt; let him show, above all things, wherein it is malicious or unjust. For, sir, I recognize that at last justice is the rule of conduct, both official and unofficial.

inasmuch as it is the attribute of the great God of Nature, which dwelt with Him before worlds were, which will abide with Him when worlds perish, and by which the gentleman and myself shall both be judged for this day's proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, nothing gives me more pain than to be compelled to utter an unkind word toward my fellow-man; and I repeat what I said in the opening of this controversy with the gentleman, that I defy mortal man to find upon the recorded debates of this House during all my ten years' service any word of mine offensive to any human being except words provoked by an unjust assault. Am I to be condemned if having the sense to feel an insult I also have the spirit to resent it? That is my answer, sir. A man's conduct is worth more than a man's pretensions, inasmuch as conduct at last is character.

I may have spoken now with a heat unbecoming me in this place; but, sir, if I have, I shall ask the poor privilege of softening my rude words if any I have uttered in the official report. Having said this much, sir, I desire to say one word more, and I shall have done: "Grateful as I am to the good Being whose bounty has imparted to me this reasoning intellect, I hold myself proportionably indebted to him from whose enlightened understanding another ray of knowledge communicates to mine." I deeply regret that the gentleman has not thus made me his debtor.

Mr. WARD obtained the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask a moment to correct one mistake.

Mr. PILE. I object to any further continuation of this controversy. We have had enough of it.

Mr. GETZ. I also object. The gentleman from Massachusetts has had words enough about this matter.

ASSASSINATION TRIAL.

Mr. WARD. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, which in view of what has taken place is evidently proper at this time:

Whereas an ex-member of the Cabinet has declared in a public speech delivered at Boston that the testimony given on behalf of the Government on the trial of the assassins of the late President Lincoln was suborned, and that one of the accomplices of these said assassins, Mrs. Surratt, was convicted and executed without there having been any evidence of her guilt; and whereas a member of this House, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] did on the 21st day of March, 1867, in debate in this House, use the following language: "But the only victim of the gentleman's prowess that I know of was an innocent woman, hung upon the scaffold, one Mrs. Surratt. And I can sustain the memory of Fort Fisher if he [Mr. BINGHAM] and his associates can sustain him in shedding the blood of a woman tried by a military commission and convicted without sufficient evidence, in my judgment;" and whereas the trial of said assassins was essentially national in its character, and the public honor requires that its grave and deliberate impeachment of the integrity of its proceedings shall be investigated and the truth declared: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed by the Speaker to examine thoroughly into said charges, and to report thereon, and that they have authority to send for all persons and papers which may be required in conducting said investigation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object. This question never ought to have come here, and never ought to go any further.

Mr. WARD. I move that the rules be suspended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 90.

Mr. WARD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

MARINE HOSPITAL, EVANSVILLE, INDIANA.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution relating to the sale of the Marine Hospital at Evansville, Indiana.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was received, and read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Marine Hospital at Evansville, Indiana, to Bernard Nurse, for the sum of $10,000, that being the highest sum offered at the time the same was exposed to sale under advertisement dated February 13, 1867, on condition that the building shall be used only for hospital purposes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The resolution should be modified so as to provide that it shall be sold to the highest bidder.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the House will allow me to make a brief explanation I think I can satisfy them.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to move an amendment that it shall only be sold to the highest bidder on advertisement duly made?

Mr. NIBLACK. It has been put up for sale, and there were two bids of the same amount. My resolution proposes to give the preference to the party who wants to keep it as a hospital over the other party who wishes to use it for his own private purposes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It ought to be differently worded. I do not like it to go in this way.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am acting under the advice of the officer having charge of it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will move as an amendment that it shall be sold to the highest bidder who proposes to keep it for hospital purposes.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment by providing that it shall not be sold at less than $10,001.

Mr. NIBLACK. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and my amendment will then read as follows:

Provided, That it shall be sold to the highest bidder who shall keep the same for hospital purposes; and for the sum of not less than $10,001.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to strike out the words "who will keep the same for hospital purposes."

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not in order, as the main question has been ordered to be now put.

The amendment of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I want to know of the gentleman from Indiana why the provision should be kept in that it shall only be sold to the highest bidder, who will keep it for hospital purposes?

Mr. SCHENCK. This man wants to use it for hospital purposes, while others want to use it for manufacturing purposes. We desire that the former shall have the preference at the same price.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NIBLACK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALL OF COMMITTEES FOR REPORTS.

The SPEAKER stated the morning hour had now commenced, and that committees would be called for reports.

PROPERTY LOST IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House joint resolution No. 22, declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution provides that section two of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the expenses incurred by the Territories of Washington and Oregon in the suppression of Indian hostilities therein in the years 1855 and 1856," approved March 2, 1861, shall be so construed that whenever any claimant for such property shall comply with all the terms and conditions of the act of March 3, 1849, on the subject of property lost in the military service, he, she, or they shall be paid the amount of the judgment in his, her, or their favor entered by the Third Auditor, and certified by him, as required by the last named act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask for the reading of the report of the Senate committee, which will fully explain this matter.

The report was read, as follows:

"Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service, made the following report:

"The only question appears to be whether under the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1849, the Treasury Department is authorized to pay the amounts awarded for horses and other property lost; or in other words, whether that section operates as an appropriation of the money. The language of the section is that 'when such judgments shall be in favor of such claim, the claimant or his legal representative shall be entitled to the amount thereof upon the production of a copy thereof certified by said Auditor at the Treasury of the United States.' The committee think the intention of Congress was to appropriate in this general way any sum of money necessary to satisfy those judgments or awards of the Third Auditor; still the language is not, as they think, so precise and exact as should be employed in an appropriation from the Treasury, and they are by no means surprised that it has received a different construction. They therefore report back the joint resolution with amendments, and recommend its passage."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM M'GARRIHAN.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of William McGarrihan, relative to a claim to a certain land-grant known as Rancho Penasco Grande, in California, reported back House bill No. 65, for his relief, accompanied by a report, to which was appended certain documents, and moved that the bill, report, and accompanying documents be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, also reported from the same committee a joint resolution relative to the Rancho Penasco Grande; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution directs the Secretary of the Interior to withhold the issuing of any patent, and to permit no proceeding in his Department affecting the title to the tract of land known as Rancho Penasco Grande, in the counties of Monterey and Fresno, in California, until the claim thereto now pending in Congress shall have been disposed of; and that no title or claim to said land or any part thereof shall be made or perfected, or any proceeding for that purpose be taken under any existing law, until the said claim now pending in Congress shall have been disposed of.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS FERNANDEZ.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Francis Fernandez, praying for a special act of naturalization; and the same was laid on the table.

CAPITOL WATCHMEN.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 79, to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that the watchmen on the dome of the Capitol, at the congressional stables, the gate-keeper and the watchmen of the Capitol grounds be hereafter appointed by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House, and that the officers aforesaid be also authorized to appoint three additional watchmen, one for each of the eastern porticoes and carriage-ways under the same, each watchman so appointed to receive $1,000, payable on the order of one of the Sergeants-at-Arms. The bill appropriates the amount of money necessary to pay said watchmen until the end of the present fiscal year, and also to pay an additional lieutenant and private of the Capitol police, authorized to be appointed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses of Congress. It further authorizes the Sergeants-at-Arms to select a pattern for a uniform for the Capitol police and watchmen, and to furnish two suits of the same per year to each member of the force at a cost not exceeding fifty dollars per suit; also the necessary belt, arms, &c., at a cost not exceeding twenty dollars per man, the amount being payable upon the certificate of the officers above named, one half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one half out of that of the House of Representatives.

Section two authorizes the said Sergeants-at-Arms to make such rules and regulations as they may deem necessary to preserve the peace and secure the Capitol from defacement and for the protection of the public property therein, and confers power to arrest and detain any person violating said rules until such person can be brought before the proper authorities for trial without further order of Congress.

Section three repeals all laws inconsistent herewith.

Mr. HOLMAN. As this bill has not yet been printed I raise the point of order that as it contains an appropriation it must first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move that the rules be suspended, in order that the bill may be considered in the House at this time.

The question was taken on suspending the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WOODBRIDGE and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 57, noes 26.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ROSS called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes seven.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The result of the vote was declared as above.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I will state for the benefit of gentlemen who oppose this bill on the ground that it appropriates a large sum of money, that it makes no appropriation except for the pay of three additional watchmen, and for providing a uniform for the watchmen not to exceed $100 per man, for each year. The whole appropriation, beyond that now provided by law, will not exceed five or six thousand dollars. Three additional watchmen, which it seems to be necessary to have, are provided for by this bill, namely, one at the eastern portico of the Senate, one at the eastern portico of the House, and one at the carriage-drives at the eastern front of the Capitol. And these watchmen are to be appointed by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House, as the policemen now are under a law passed at the last session of Congress.

The bill also provides that these officers shall appoint the additional lieutenant of police, and the additional policeman authorized by the resolution of the last Congress, instead of having them appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, as provided for by that resolution.

The bill also provides that these policemen shall be uniformed at an expense of not more than $100 each per year. Now, it seems to me that this is a very proper; and indeed a very important measure. Our policemen are now scarcely distinguishable from any ordinary citizen who may be passing through the Capitol or about its grounds. In my judgment, they should have some distinguishing mark or suitable uniform, because in the first place it gives them more influence and authority, as they are more easily recognized; and in the second place it gives them an esprit de corps, which is useful in an organization of this kind.

This bill also provides that the amount necessary to pay these additional expenses shall be taken one half from the contingent fund of the Senate, and one half from the contingent fund of the House. And it also provides that when a disturbance or violation of rules occurs in the Capitol or about the grounds, the Capitol police may arrest the offender and detain him in custody until he can be turned over to the proper authorities for trial. This a very important power to be exercised by our police, if they are to be effective as police, in preserving the Capitol from defacement and the grounds from injury.

It seems to me there is nothing in this bill but what is necessary. If I am not mistaken, and I am quite sure I am not, the bill meets the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Judiciary, who have examined it. It involves the additional appropriation of only a few thousand dollars. Indeed the only additional amount absolutely necessary under this bill is for the uniforming of the police, which will amount to from two thousand five hundred to five thousand dollars; not over $5,000 and probably not a great deal over $2,500. I hope this bill will meet with the approval of this House.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes 30.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes eight; not one fifth of the last vote.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were—ayes eight; not one fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused; and the yeas and nays were refused.

The bill was accordingly passed.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—HOGAN VS. PILE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House additional evidence in the contested-election case of Hogan vs. Pile; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION ACT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House, inclosing the following communication from the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, March 25, 1867.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, transmitting an act of Congress entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," which supplementary act is certified to have been passed on the 23d of March, 1867, by two thirds of both Houses of Congress, after it had been returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, by the President, with his objections. The act shall be duly promulgated as one of the laws of the United States.

I am your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

EDWARD McPHERSON, Esq.,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The letter will be printed; and the fact recorded upon the Journal officially for future reference.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress, approved August 16, 1856."

The joint resolution, which was read at length, provides that the compensation allowed to members of Congress by the act of August 16, 1856, and the several acts and joint resolutions amendatory thereof, shall be paid in the manner following:

On the first day of the first session of each Congress, or as soon thereafter as he may be in attendance and apply, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate is to receive his mileage as now provided by law, and all his compensation from the beginning of his term, to be computed at the rate of $5,000 per year; and thereafter during the session and during the ensuing adjournment, compensation at the same rate to be paid monthly upon the order of the Senator, Member, or Delegate entitled thereto; and on the first day of the second or any subsequent session he is to receive his mileage as now provided by law, and during the said session, and the subsequent compensation at the same rate. But nothing contained in the resolution is to be construed as repealing the existing provision of law that no mileage shall be paid for attendance at the first session of any Congress to the members of the immediately preceding Congress.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That each Senator, member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate in Congress, after having taken and subscribed the required oath, shall be entitled to receive his compensation at the end of each month at the rate now established by law.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I was not aware that this bill had been considered by the Judiciary Committee. It was introduced in the House to-day after the session commenced, and I have had no notice of any meeting of the committee or of any consideration of this bill by the committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It has been considered by the committee. As the gentleman who offered the resolution thought it necessary that it should be acted on at once, a majority of the members of the committee were consulted. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] was not in his seat at the time.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Very well. I desire, however, to submit an amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will hear it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It is to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be allowed and paid mileage at the rate of ten cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session, but no constructive mileage shall be allowed or paid.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That matter has not been considered by the committee. I cannot yield to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, have I not the right to offer it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor. Should he relinquish the floor without calling the previous question, or should the previous question, if called, be not sustained, an amendment will be in order.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I give notice that I shall offer that amendment if I should have an opportunity. I will ask the House to vote down the previous question so I may offer the amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask whether the gentleman from Ohio is prepared to make a report on the subject which was referred to him at the close of the last session?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir; I am. This proposition, however, does not relate to that subject. It relates to mileage only.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to know also whether the gentleman has paid back into the Treasury the extra compensation which he received? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir; I have not, and I do not intend to do so. Whatever compensation is fixed by law I expect to receive, in common with other members. I received no extra compensation; I received the increased compensation allowed by the law of the last Congress, as all other members did, and that I suppose is what is meant by the extra compensation. I did not refuse to receive it, because my refusal, or even a refunding of it to the Treasury, would not inure to the sole benefit of the district I have the honor to represent. My district would in that event only receive the benefit of the two hundred and forty-second part of it, a mere infinitesimal portion. All the districts would share alike the benefit, and I do not propose that other districts whose members take full pay shall in addition enjoy the benefit of that which the law declares me as the Representative of my district entitled to have. I wish to apply the same rule of law to all members of the House, for in this way alone can justice be done and a proper remedy be applied. I voted against the increase of salary from a sense of duty, and I am ready now to again demonstrate my faith by my words. I shall do what my judgment dictates to be right on this as I do on all other subjects; and I hope this Congress will have enough of dignity and self-respect to treat this subject as they do all others; that they will treat it with that decorum and dignity which becomes the Representatives of the people.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The committee, of course, have had no session, and I do not feel at liberty to go into a discussion on the subject of mileage. The effect of the pending proposition is to allow members to receive their pay monthly during the recess as well as during the sessions of Congress.

Now, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be able to overcome his conscientious scruples, if he has any, about receiving the extra pay. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I wish to say to the House and to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the amendment I have submitted does not relate to extra compensation at all. I have not professed to have any special conscientious scruples on that subject. On the contrary, I have said whatever is voted by Congress in the way of mileage or compensation that I will take.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this subject. During the Thirty-Ninth Congress my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] reported from the Military Committee a bill fixing the mileage of certain military officers at ten cents a mile; and in every law of Congress where the subject of mileage is referred to, or allowed for any purpose, it is fixed at ten cents a mile, or at a less rate, except only for members of Congress. I know no reason why, with the improved facilities for travel which we now have, one rate of mileage should be allowed for members of Congress and another rate for other officers of the Government. The mileage of the members from California and Oregon, at the present rate, will amount to $6,000 or more for a Congress—for the entire term of two years.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire if I understood the gentleman from Ohio correctly, that he wishes it to be understood he only takes the extra compensation provided for by law and whatever mileage Congress sees fit to grant, not because he desires the money, but out of respect and in obedience to the law?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I said no such thing. I will take it, however, because it is fixed by law.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be now put.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The substitute was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to amend the title so that it would read "A joint resolution in reference to the payment of salaries of members of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLICITOR OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 63, making the office of solicitor of the Court of Claims a bureau in the office of the Attorney General, and for other purposes, with the following substitute:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That from and after the 1st day of April, 1867, there shall be established in the office and under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, for the time being, a bureau, to be called the bureau of the solicitor of the Court of Claims. The officers of said bureau shall consist of one solicitor and two assistant solicitors, who shall be in lieu of the present solicitors, and shall discharge the duties now imposed upon the solicitors of said court by force of existing law, and shall be severally appointed by the Court of Claims, and shall hold their office for four years, unless sooner removed by said Court. The solicitor shall receive an annual salary of $4,000; the first assistant $3,500; the second assistant $3,000; each payable quarterly. The Attorney General shall have power to appoint two clerks of the fourth class, and one clerk at a salary not exceeding $2,000, in said bureau.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the said solicitor and his assistants in all cases brought against the United States in said Court of Claims, founded upon any contract, agreement, or transaction, with any executive department, or any bureau, officer, or agent of such department, or where the matter or thing on which the claim is based shall have been passed upon and decided by any department, bureau, or officer intrusted by law or department regulations with the settlement and adjustment of such claims, demands, or accounts, to transmit to said department, bureau, or officer, as aforesaid, a printed copy of the petition filed by the claimant in such case, with a request that the said department, bureau, or officer to whom the same shall be so transmitted, as aforesaid, will furnish to said solicitor all facts, circumstances, and evidence touching said claim, as is or may be in the possession or knowledge of the said department, bureau, or officer and it shall be the duty of the said department, bureau, or officer to whom such petition may be transmitted, and such request preferred, as aforesaid, without delay, and within a reasonable time, to furnish said solicitor with a full statement of all the facts, information, and proofs which are or may be within the knowledge or in the possession of said department, bureau, or officer relating to the claim aforesaid. Such statement shall also contain a reference to or description of all official documents or papers, if any, as may or do furnish proof of facts referred to in said statement, or that may be necessary and proper for the defense of the United States against the said claim, together with the department, office, or place where the same is kept or may be procured. And if the said claim department, bureau, or officer, as aforesaid, shall have been passed upon and decided by the said department, bureau, or officer, the statement, or answer to be transmitted to said solicitor, as hereinbefore provided, shall succinctly state the reasons and principles upon which such decision shall have been made upon any act of Congress, or upon any section or clause of such act, the same shall be cited specifically. And if any previous interpretation or construction shall have been given to such act, section, or clause by the said department or bureau transmitting such statement, the same shall be set forth succinctly in said statement, and a copy of the opinion filed, if any, shall be annexed to such statement and transmitted with the same to the solicitor aforesaid. And where any decision in the case shall have been based upon any regulation of an executive department, or where such regulation shall or may, in the opinion of the department, bureau, or officer transmitting such statement, have any bearing upon the claim in suit, the same shall be distinctly referred to, and quoted in extenso in the statement transmitted to said solicitor: Provided, however, That where there shall be pending in the said court more than one case, or a class of cases, the defense to which shall rest upon the same facts, circumstances, and proofs, the said department, bureau, or officer shall only be required to certify and transmit one statement of the same, and such statement shall be held to apply to all such class of cases as if made out, certified, and transmitted in each case respectively.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the head of any executive department, whenever any claim is made upon said Department involving disputed facts or controverted questions of law where the amount in controversy exceeds $3,000, or where the decision will affect a class of cases or furnish a precedent for the future action of any executive department in the adjustment of a class of cases without regard to the amount involved in the particular case, or where any authority, right, privilege, or exemption is claimed or denied under the Constitution of the United States, to cause such claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in as if originally commenced by the voluntary action of the claimant: Provided, however, That no case shall be referred by any head of a Department unless it belongs to one of the several classes of cases as to which, by reason of the subject-matter and character, the said Court of Claims might under existing laws take jurisdiction on such voluntary action of the claimant. And the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller of the Treasury, direct any account, matter, or claim of the character, amount, or class described or limited in this section, to be transmitted, with all the vouchers, papers, documents, and proofs pertaining thereto, to the said Court of Claims for trial and adjudication. And all the cases mentioned in this section which shall be transmitted by the head of any executive department, or upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller, shall be proceeded in as other cases pending in said court, and shall, in all respects, be subject to the same rules and regulations, and appeals from the final judgments or decrees of the said court therein to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be allowed in the manner now provided by law. The amount of the final judgments or decrees in such cases so transmitted to said court, where rendered in favor of the claimants, shall in all cases be paid out of any specific appropriation applicable to the same, if any such there be; and where no such appropriation exists, the same shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said court.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all provisions of any act incompatible herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Unless there is a desire to debate this bill I will call the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, before making the point of order that I intend to make, I suggest that as the bill is a pretty long one, and much of it is in manuscript, it had better be postponed and printed. I do not think ten gentlemen in the House understand its provisions. Some of them I notice are pretty important. It creates, I believe, four officers. It provides salaries of $4,000, $3,500, $3,000, and $2,000. I suggest, therefore, that it be postponed for a day or two, so as to have it printed. If that is not allowed, I must make the point of order that it makes an appropriation and should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill does not contain an appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS. I think there is an appropriation in some of the concluding clauses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair examined the bill while the gentleman was speaking.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish the Clerk would read it.

The SPEAKER. The creation of an office and fixing its salary is not an appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS. I know it is not, but it provides an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It reads "shall in all cases be paid out of any specific appropriation applicable to the same, if any such there be; and where no such appropriation exists, the same shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said court." There is no appropriation; it does not take any money out of the Treasury.

Mr. BROOKS. How are these judgments to be paid?

The SPEAKER. They are paid out of the appropriations made from time to time. The gentleman is as familiar with the law as the Chair.

Mr. BROOKS. If this should not go to the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman ought at least to give us time to read the bill in print and know what it is. We have already been obliged to repeal three or four acts of Congress at the last session, and we are to have several more repealed or modified. This is a most dangerous mode of legislation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I have to say that the bill reported by the committee is almost the same as House bill No. 63, which has been in print several days.

Mr. BROOKS. There are very serious changes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The alteration is in the first section, which has been reported by the committee in manuscript. As far as the expenditures are concerned, they will be the same under the bill as they now are under the existing law. We have by law three solicitors, each receiving $3,500 a year, making $10,500. This bill differs in this: that it makes the salary of the chief solicitor $4,000; of the first assistant, $3,500, and of the second assistant, $3,000, making in all $10,500—just what is appropriated at the present time. The only real difference in this bill is that it authorizes the appointment of two clerks, where only one is allowed by the existing law.

The advantage to be derived from this bill is a practical one, with reference to the administration of the Executive Departments of the Government and with reference to economy also. At present the Executive Departments of the Government have legally no communication with the solicitors for the Court of Claims. The consequence is when great causes are there pending, involving to the extent of hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars, there is no responsible channel of communication between any of the Executive Departments of the Government and the solicitors in this court, on whose integrity and ability the financial interest of the country, in a very large degree, depend. By this bill the solicitors of the Court of Claims are made a bureau in the office of the Attorney General, and he is charged with the general control of their proceedings. Through the Attorney General a means of communication is established with all the Departments of the Government, they communicating with him, and he being directly responsible for the manner in which those duties are performed.

In reference to the salaries, I may say that if I could have my own way in reference to this matter I would establish the office of solicitor for the Court of Claims with a salary of not less than $6,000 a year; because hereafter, for the next few years at least, undoubtedly the first talent of the country is to be employed in this court. Great and important interests are there pending, and the country should be represented by the best counsel at its command. But with the present feeling as to salaries, the committee have reported the sum of $4,000, trusting that the increase of $500 may enable us at least to gain something in respect to talent—I suppose nothing will be gained in respect to integrity—for the protection of the interests of the Government.

We have made a change in one particular, and I do not conceal it from the House; I state it with great frankness. By the operation of this bill the present solicitors are removed from their offices, and the Court of Claims itself is authorized to appoint three solicitors; which, upon the whole, was thought to be the most judicious way of proceeding in this matter. The judges of the Court of Claims, in a certain sense, represent the Government judicially. They are bound in honor, as well as by their oaths of office, to see to it that everything done in their courts is well and faithfully done. And, upon the whole, we thought it the wisest way, as we could properly do it under the Constitution, to charge that court with the duty of appointing these officers:

I believe I have now stated to the House all the changes involved in the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. My great objection to this mode of legislation is the utter impossibility for members of the House to comprehend a bill presented for action. While I have the greatest respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] and the committee of which he is a member, yet it is none the less for our own self-respect that we should be enabled to understand that upon which we are called upon to vote, so as to be able to explain the reasons for our own votes to the people who are our constituents. Now, let me suggest what will be the probable consequences of this mode of legislation. We have already passed bills at this session to repeal three or four of the laws passed near the close of the last session of Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman will pardon me; but the morning hour is about expiring, and if I do not get the previous question seconded and the main question ordered before the end of the morning hour the bill will have to go over until to-morrow. The necessity for the passage of this bill is pressing; the financial interests of the country will be endangered by allowing the present condition of things to continue. I must therefore ask the gentleman to excuse me while I resume the floor and call the previous question upon this bill. After the main question is ordered I will again yield to the gentleman.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield again to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BROOKS. What I was about to say, and what I wish to particularly call to the attention of the majority of this House, is the consequence of this dangerous mode of legislation, without thorough consideration by the great body of the members of this House, of important bills like this. For example, the wool-tariff bill, which passed during the closing hours of the last session of the Senate, and which had previously passed the House with little or no consideration, is already found at the Treasury Department to be a bill which it is impossible to execute. And in the course of to-day or to-morrow there will probably be a proposition presented by some member on the other side of the House for essential amendments and alterations of that very important bill. The bill was passed under the operation of the previous question, without explanation or consideration.

Now, let me suggest to gentlemen on the other side of the House who are responsible for the laws that are passed here, and who do not, by these constant changes and alterations of their own laws, occupy that attitude before the public which is desirable, that with these precedents before us it is necessary that we should be exceedingly careful of the mode and manner in which we proceed. Here is a most important bill, a bill changing the organization of the Court of Claims, extending its sphere, enlarging its mode of operation; and yet the nature and character of the bill we are called upon to take altogether upon trust. Now, sir, I am willing to take as much upon trust as any one; but I am not willing to be a mere instrument for the enactment of laws without being able to read and comprehend them. I trust that the bill will be allowed to go over till to-morrow morning; and if before that time we do not sufficiently educate ourselves as to the provisions of the bill, it will be the fault of the individual members, not the fault of the House of Representatives.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Mr. Speaker, in addition to what has been suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] there is another consideration which makes it very essential that further time should be allowed for the examination of this bill. If I understand the bill, it transfers to the office of the Attorney General the management of the business of the Government in the Court of Claims, establishing a new bureau in that office. Now, we all know that since the termination of the war so many new questions have arisen that the office of the Attorney General is entirely overrun with business, subjecting the office to a greater responsibility than is desirable. The Attorney General is the legal adviser of all the other departments of the Government, and it seems to me unwise to increase the amount of business requiring his attention. The gentleman from New York has very properly objected to hasty legislation upon a question of this kind. For myself I should like to have time to examine the question; and other members I have no doubt would be glad to have the same opportunity.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, all the provisions of this bill with reference to the jurisdiction of the court have been in print for a week, and constructively upon the desks of members. The facts suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN TRUMP] touching the Attorney General's department are the reasons which controlled the committee in favor of placing this bureau in the office of the Attorney General. We propose to provide the additional force by which the business of the bureau is to be performed. It is to be transacted, to be sure, under the direction of the Attorney General; but the chief advantage will be that the Executive Departments of the Government will have responsible means of communicating with the bureau of the solicitors of the Court of Claims. At the present time, under the existing law, the Attorney General takes charge of all causes carried by appeal from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore his duties will not be increased by the passage of this bill. The bill contains no provision extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. The judgments of the court are to be paid in no different manner from that now provided for.

Deeming it unnecessary to detain the House longer with this subject, I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

On the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 62, noes 21.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the title of the bill so as to read, "An act placing the solicitor and assistant solicitors of the Court of Claims in the department of the Attorney General, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

USE OF THE HALL FOR A LECTURE.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to suspend the rules to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be granted to the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, District of Columbia, for the lecture of Theodore Tilton, Esq., on Thursday night, March 28th, instant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by the rule of the House the Speaker is prohibited from entertaining any proposition granting the use of the Hall except for legislative purposes and for meetings in which members of the House participate. The gentleman might modify the resolution so as to provide for a meeting in which members of the House of Representatives shall take part. If so modified, the rules could be suspended for the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. I modify the resolution in the manner suggested by the Speaker, and move to suspend the rules.

On the motion there were—ayes 44, noes 40.
So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BROOMALL moved that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE PATENT OFFICE FORCE.

The first business on the Speaker's table were the following amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 28, to increase the force of the Patent Office.

Strike out the following sections:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to appoint, by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, a solicitor of the Patent Office, who shall be considered its law officer, whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum, to be paid from the patent fund, and whose duty it shall be to render all reasonable aid in the transaction of the business of said office that may be required of him by the said Commissioner.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the salary of the first assistant examiners and disbursing clerk shall be $2,000, and the salary of the librarian shall be $2,500, which shall be in full for his services as translator and librarian.

Amend the title by striking out "and for other purposes."

Mr. MYERS. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in. I hope those sections will be enacted into law when Congress again meets. I am sorry that they have been struck out by the Senate.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF NORTHERN CREDITORS.

The next business on the Speaker's table were amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 1, relative to claims of certain northern creditors.

The preamble and joint resolution were read, as follows:

Whereas the congress of the confederate States ordered the sequestration and confiscation of all the debts due from inhabitants of the southern States to their creditors residing in the loyal States; and whereas there was paid to the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, prior to the 1st day of May, 1862, a sum exceeding half a million dollars, the proceeds of such confiscation of northern credits, of which there remained to the credit of the confederate States receivers, in such bank, the sum of $219,090 94 only, on the 1st day of May, at the time of the occupation of the city of New Orleans by the forces of the United States, which said sum, by the order of the general then commanding the department of the Gulf, was seized for the benefit of the northern creditors whose debts had been thus confiscated, and said sum was by him sent to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to be by him held in trust for the benefit of said northern creditors; and whereas owing to a doubt entertained by the Secretary of the Treasury as to his legal authority to distribute said sum of $219,090 94 among the creditors to whom it belongs, and to determine the rights of each to his portion thereof, the money has lain thus undisturbed in the Treasury since July, 1862, to the great injury and detriment of the just and lawful owners thereof, although they have made many applications to have the same: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a commission of three persons, one of whom shall be learned in the law, to hear and determine the various claims of the parties who are entitled to said sum of $219,090 94, ratably among the persons who shall present their claims and be entitled thereto, to an amount not exceeding the claim of each when confiscated, with interest thereon: Provided, That any claim which shall not be presented within three months after public notice of a meeting of commissioners to receive such claim shall not be allowed or paid by order of said commissioners; And provided further, That the cost of said commission shall be paid out of said money.

Strike out all after "of" in line eleven of the preamble to "only" in line thirteen, and insert in lieu thereof "$178,897 50."

Strike out all after "of" in line twenty-two of the preamble to "among" in line twenty-three, and insert in lieu thereof "$178,897 50."

Page 2, strike out all after "to" in line three to the end of the resolution, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Take and report to Congress evidence in support of the claims of the several parties whose debts were sequestrated and contributed to produce said sum of $178,897 50, together with the date at which such debts were contracted and the interest accrued thereon to the date of said report: Provided, That the said commission shall give public notice of the time and place at which said claims shall be presented by advertising the same in some newspaper published in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans for three months; and no claim shall be considered unless it shall be presented at or before the time so advertised: And provided further, That the cost of said commission shall be paid out of said money.

Mr. BUTLER. All those amendments are only for the proper working of the resolution; and I move that they be concurred in.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I think the House does not perfectly understand what this is. As I understand it has not been referred to any committee of this House, although it deals with large sums of money. It seems to me a bill involving such consequences ought to be considered, and I hope it will not be allowed to pass without careful consideration so that the country may be secured against all loss.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman had listened to the preamble and resolution he would have seen that it was sent to the Senate from this House after consideration here. It concerns certain claimants to money sent from New Orleans by the commanding general of that department to the Treasury arising from the proceeds of confiscated debts. It is a fund in the Treasury that belongs to those loyal creditors, and this bill only provides for a commissioner under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury to settle that matter. The amendment of the Senate is that the commission shall report to Congress so that it can have the whole matter in charge after the report is made.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would inquire whether this bill has received the consideration of any committee of this House?

Mr. BUTLER. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I think I understand this plan of getting measures of this sort through. Having first the reports of officers of the Government, the legislation necessary to carry out their recommendations follows. Now, this particular case may be all very proper. I do not undertake to say it is not, but I do say that it seems to me a measure of the importance which this apparently is ought to go to some committee of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I entirely concur with the gentleman, and I move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which he is a member. Five minutes of explanation, I am sure, will induce the gentleman to report in its favor.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. That is a sensible remark.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the House No. 21, relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the House No. 1, relative to the claims of certain northern creditors, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

It further announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 114) amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory; and

An act (S. No. 112) to incorporate the Lincoln Monument Association.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT WAREHOUSES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of Senate bill No. 80, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell the property on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York, being warehouses Nos. 54, 56, and 58, now owned by the Government, the sale to be made at public auction to the highest and best bidder therefor in ready money, after giving notice thereof six weeks in succession in two daily papers printed in the city of New York. And upon sale being made as aforesaid the said Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered to make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser thereof a good and sufficient deed for the premises, conveying all the right, title, and interest of the United States.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The three warehouses mentioned in this bill have not for the last ten years, except in one or two instances where condemned cotton was stored during the war, been required nor used by the Government at all. The buildings are going into decay. All that the Treasury Department can do is to rent them; and in order to make them suitable for renting some five or ten thousand dollars will have to be immediately expended. I have letters in my possession, which I will have read if any member desires it, from the supervising architect of the Treasury Department and from the Secretary of the Treasury himself, showing that these buildings will not be required for the use of the Government. Therefore, as a matter of economy, it is advisable that the property be sold, and the money put into the Treasury of the United States.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN WYCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORLEF E. DREUTZER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of Senate bill No. 89, for the relief of Orlef E. Dreutzer, late consul of the United States to the kingdom of Norway; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) concerning the uniform of persons in the diplomatic service of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 18, for the sale of certain stocks held in trust for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire that resolution to be put upon its passage.

Mr. ALLISON. It is an important bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask it to be reported.

The joint resolution was read. The first section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay the claims of certain Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and other loyal persons, as are provided for in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of the treaty concluded with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians on the 28th of April, 1866, and for that purpose authorizes him to sell such of the stocks held by the United States in trust for the benefit of those Indians as he may deem expedient and proper; provided that no sale shall be made of any stocks issued by the State of Indiana, nor shall any stocks be sold for less than the par value thereof, and no further sale of said stocks shall be made than may be necessary to pay said claims; and provided further that no such stocks shall be sold, and no money shall be paid on such claims, unless the Secretary of the Interior shall have first examined and ratified or approved the awards made by commissioners, as stipulated in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of said treaty; and provided further, that nothing contained in this act shall be construed as recommending for his approval any awards already made under said treaty; and provided further, that the amount realized from the sale of said stocks shall be reinvested in United States stocks out of any money that may be found due said tribe on the first settlement with said tribe.

The second section provides that if the Secretary of the Interior shall not approve or confirm the awards already made, the President shall, on being notified thereof, appoint other commissioners, who shall take testimony and report as provided by the terms of the said treaty; and the President may fix the times and places for the meeting of said commissioners for taking testimony on the claims presented; and the Secretary of the Interior is required to pay the amount of award due to each Indian in person, and no part thereof shall be paid to any assignee, agent, or attorney.

Mr. WINDOM obtained the floor.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I desire to move to refer this bill to its appropriate committee.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot yield for that purpose at present. I will explain to the House what this bill is, and then if it is the desire of the House to refer the bill they can do so.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WINDOM. Very well.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire to know whether the gentleman proposes to allow an opportunity for a motion to refer this bill to a committee or for any other action than the immediate passage of the bill?

Mr. WINDOM. I shall call the previous question after I have explained the bill to the House. If they do not wish to pass the bill, after having heard the explanation, then as a matter of course they will not vote to sustain the call for the previous question.

Mr. KOONTZ. I would inquire of the gentleman if this bill does not propose to meet claims which the House at the last session refused to put in the deficiency bill?

Mr. WINDOM. It is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. UPSON. Is it not connected with the same claim?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand this bill to provide for the sale of the bonds of the school fund of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, for the purpose of paying loyal Indians and others for the losses of property sustained by them in consequence of the rebellion. It has been the uniform decision of Congress not to reimburse even white loyalists who have lost their property through the rebellion, because the claims would be so enormous that the Treasury could not meet them. Now, I do not see why we should authorize the sale of the bonds of these Indians, in order to reimburse these loyal Indians, many of whom are nearly white. No doubt they can produce the best kind of record of their loyalty; about such a record as we should probably get in any case presented by a white loyal claimant.

I know it will be said by my friends that there is a treaty in regard to this matter, one made last August. The Choctaws and Chickasaws are here by their delegates, saying that this bill ought not to pass, protesting against it. I am informed that a proposition something like this failed in the last Congress; it was a proposition of some kind to get at the money of these Indians.

Now, all I ask is that this bill shall take the course which I yielded to allow my own bill to take a few moments since: be sent to some committee of the House to be fully and thoroughly investigated. If it is sent to the committee of which my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] was and probably will be chairman—I do not know a better committee in the world if the other members are like its chairman—I will be content to take his report. But I want him, on his responsibility as chairman of the committee, to assure me after full investigation that the bill is right.

I am always very doubtful when I hear anybody say anything about getting something from the Indians or for the Indians. But I am especially troubled when I hear that $350,000 of the bonds of the Indian fund which this bill calls for is to be sold and the money to be divided among the Indians, whether loyal or disloyal.

Mr. WINDOM. I certainly have no feeling in this matter, and do not desire to press this bill, unless the House are willing to pass it. There is an evident misunderstanding in reference to this matter, as indicated by the several questions which have been addressed to me.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOONTZ] on my right, asks if this is not the same claim which was defeated in the deficiency bill in the last Congress. As I stated a moment ago, it is a very different proposition. That bill, I think, proposed to pay some one million eight hundred thousand dollars to these Chickasaws and Choctaws. This provides that the Chickasaws and Choctaws shall pay the debt which they have bound themselves by treaty stipulations to pay; that the disloyal Indians shall pay the damages which they have inflicted upon the loyal Indians belonging to their tribes. And it is the loyal Indians of this nation who appear here and demand the fulfillment of those treaty stipulations.

I will state very briefly the facts of the case. On the 28th of April, 1866, a treaty was entered into between the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations and the United States, whereby the Government agreed to forgive their past offenses and to pay them the debts which were due them. Among the considerations for this concession on the part of the United States was the stipulation that these Chickasaws and Choctaws should make compensation for the damages which had been done by them to the loyal Indians in their midst. A clause was inserted in the treaty providing for a commission to be sent to the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, to take the proof of damages inflicted by the disloyal upon the loyal Indians. In making this treaty it was proposed that the Government should stand by its friends who had stood by it during the rebellion; and the expectation was that while we conferred certain benefits upon the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, we would compel them to stand by their agreements in the treaty and pay for the damages which they had inflicted upon our friends there.

Let me read, Mr. Speaker, the provision of the treaty:

"And it is further agreed that a commission to consist of a person or persons to be appointed by the President of the United States shall be appointed immediately on the ratification of this treaty, who shall take into consideration and determine the claim of such Choctaws and Chickasaws as allege that they have been driven during the late rebellion from their homes in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, on account of their adhesion to the United States, for damages, with power to make such award as may be consistent with equity and good conscience, taking into view all the circumstances, whose report when ratified by the Secretary of the Interior shall be final, and authorize the payment of the amount from any moneys of said nations in the hands of the United States as the said commission may award.

Now, there are, I believe, no moneys of these nations in the hands of the United States; but there are bonds amounting, I think, to about one million seven hundred thousand dollars. The Secretary of the Interior does not feel that under existing law he has the right to sell those bonds; and this bill proposes simply to authorize the sale of a portion of the bonds in order that the awards of these commissioners, when confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, may be carried out, and these loyal Indians paid. This, as I understand, is the whole of the bill, except the additional provision that the money shall be paid only to the Indian claimants themselves, not to agents.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to obtain some information in relation to this bill. As I understand the provisions of the treaty these bonds are now held by the United States as a trust fund for the benefit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations; and the amount of these bonds, as I understand, is $1,700,000. Am I correct?

Mr. WINDOM. That is about the amount.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, it seems to me there may be a question whether or not the entire amount of those bonds is not forfeited to the United States from the fact that those Indian tribes engaged in the rebellion against the Government.

Mr. WINDOM. Let me say right here in reference to that question that the bonds were forfeited until this treaty was ratified between the United States and these Indians. By the treaty all forfeitures were revoked, a part of the conditions of the revocation being that these Indians should pay the debts which they owed for damages inflicted upon loyal Indians in their midst.

Mr. ALLISON. The section which the gentleman has read provides that these damages shall be paid out of any moneys in the hands of the United States belonging to these Indians. Now, if the United States should undertake to interfere with this special trust fund and sell a portion of these bonds for the purpose of paying these claims, will not the next proposition on the part of these Indians be that Congress shall reimburse them for the bonds thus sold? If I recollect aright the provision of the bill, it specially provides that there shall be a reimbursement of these bonds or a reinvestment of them.

Mr. WINDOM. I recollect no provision of that kind.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there is a provision of that kind; so that if we sell these bonds we will be compelled to reinvest an equal amount in other bonds.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Clerk to read the provision.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the same amount realized from the sale of said stocks shall be reinvested in United States stocks out of any money which shall be found to be due to said tribe on the final settlement with said tribe.

Mr. WINDOM. That is a different proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a different proposition, and it involves the question whether the United States is or is not indebted to these Choctaws and Chickasaws. I recollect on the last night of the session that we had a long discussion on a proposition to pay these Indians the sum of $1,800,000. It was then proposed to pay money to these Indians, but as that did not pass, it is now proposed to pay these Indians in the way provided for in the pending measure.

Mr. WINDOM. I am glad the gentleman asks these questions, for it is very evident that he needs information.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; I do desire information so as to vote on this question correctly; and I do not propose to vote for it until I do understand it.

Mr. WINDOM. The proposition at the close of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, as I stated before, was to pay the Choctaw nation a certain debt claimed to be due to them under this treaty. I then myself objected to that, and alleged, among other grounds why it should not be paid, that they had refused to pay their debts to the loyal Indians. And these are debts to the loyal Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. It is proposed, then, that we shall reinvest the same amount in other bonds of the United States.

Mr. WINDOM. This bill does not in any way commit the House on that question. It says that if anything shall be found due to these Indians, then the amount shall be reinvested in these bonds. Of course if nothing is found to be due to these Indians there will be nothing to reinvest.

Mr. ALLISON. There is one other thing which I wish to understand. I see there is a provision that if the Secretary of the Interior does not approve of the awards made by the commissioners sent among these tribes, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior or of the President of the United States to appoint other commissioners, who shall go there and take testimony, and make new awards. I submit to the gentleman, if the Secretary of the Interior shall see proper to refuse to pay a single award made by that commission, the whole question will then again be opened up for consideration. Then new commissioners will be appointed who may award millions. I think it bears that interpretation. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to select new commissioners, who may make whatever awards they please, and authorizes him to sell whatever bonds may be necessary to pay such awards.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not think it bears any such interpretation. It authorizes him to select enough of bonds to pay the claims which may be found to be due. I do not think the Secretary would refuse to confirm an award for $300,000 as too much and afterward confirm one for $500,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know about that. Mr. BALDWIN. I shall occupy the time of the House but for a few minutes. Mr. Speaker, I have paid some attention to the subject-matter of this bill, and what I have learned has created a desire to know more. I am fully persuaded, however, that it needs a most searching investigation before we take any action on the bill. As I understand, the awards are not yet made, and therefore why should we sell the bonds until we know what ought to be paid? Why may not we make these claimants wait until the money shall be invested in the bonds? Why sell the bonds or make provision for selling the bonds now? I am sure this matter needs a thorough investigation, and that instead of being passed, the bill should be ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims for future investigation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I wish to ask a question. From the discussion thus far it would seem no one but Indians are interested in this bill. I believe there are some white men interested in it.

Mr. WINDOM. So far as I am aware there are none but Indians.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. As I understand the case there are certain white men interested in this matter, and I presume if you go to the bottom of this thing it will be found it is for the benefit of white men, who are pressing this bill through. I perceive that it reads "to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the claims of certain Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians and other loyal persons." It is evident that somebody but Indians are interested.

Mr. WINDOM. There may be some white men among them that are interested.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I want to know something about it before I vote upon it. I hope it will be referred to the committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think I can give some information in regard to the white men. If the gentleman will look at the fifth article of the treaty he will find that there are two persons named in that article as having claims against the Indians, namely, Joseph P. Heald and Reuben Wright. Perhaps the claims named in the treaty amount to $90,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. They may be honorable and honest men; but this matter should be investigated.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I want to say, especially to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that Mr. Heald is a person whom I know very well. He lives in my own neighborhood, and is a very upright man. He left the Indian country when the war opened. They took possession of his flouring-mill and goods, and used them for their own purposes in aid of the rebellion. He stayed away till the close of the war, and then went back there. He interested himself, as a man naturally would who has lost a large estate, in getting this article in the treaty, and I believe he is entitled to the money.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. All I wish to say is: I think this ought to go to the appropriate committee, and my friend, I think, will agree with me in that.

Mr. WINDOM. I will take but very little more of the time of the House on this question. If the House desire to refer it to the committee and let it lie over I have certainly no objection, only that the Indians have suffered very much and they need this money. It is due to them under treaty stipulation. They are our friends and were such during the dark hours of the Government, and it is a very great hardship upon them to be refused the pay that is due them.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] asks why sell these bonds now? I tell him because these Indians were driven from their homes and everything was taken from them. They are in a suffering condition; our treaty stipulation gives them a certain amount of money, and they ask that their disloyal persecutors shall be compelled to pay that money to them.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman to yield. I desire to vote right on this question. I know one of the gentlemen on this commission, and know him to be a very high-minded, honest gentleman. But I would like to have the chairman of the former Committee on Indian Affairs to give a reason, so that the House may understand it fairly, why these people should not be heard before the committee. I ask the gentleman to allow the remonstrance which I hold in my hand to be read for information.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection; I want all the information on the subject I can get.

The Clerk read as follows:

Statement of the Choctaw delegation, showing that the claims provided to be paid by Senate joint resolution No. 177 and House joint resolution No. 298, are not loyal, but rebel, &c.

To the Senators and Representatives of the United States:

We, the undersigned, delegates of the Choctaw nation, do respectfully protest against the passage of either Senate joint resolution No. 177 or House joint resolution No. 298, both of which "provide for the payment of certain losses sustained by loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians;" and for the following reasons:

1. That three fourths of the so-called loyal claims are those of persons who can be proven to have been rebels, the majority of them having served in the rebel army.

2. That although the loyal of our nation, ourselves included, have suffered severe losses by the rebellion, in no case do we know of a single just claim for damages preferred by a thoroughly loyal man.

3. That by a treaty concluded last year between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, the Secretary of the Interior was invested with the power to pay these claims if proven on testimony to be those of loyal persons.

4. That the Secretary of the Interior has refused to authorize the payment of the awards to the claimants.

5. That the claims, even if just, are many of them fictitious, and if not fictitious, are at least three or four times in excess of damages sustained.

6. That if the resolution pass, the moneys paid in award of claims will mostly accrue to speculators, who, at a small valuation, have bought up the greater portion of the claims.

In support of our reasons we would refer you to an argument drawn up in our behalf by J. H. B. Latrobe, esq., and presented by him to the Secretary of the Interior, and if personal proof be required of us we are ready to furnish it whenever required.

We may well ask if it is not strange that joint resolutions the same in effect and purpose should be presented at the same time in the Senate and House. For ourselves and the people we represent, we denounce them as links in a vast chain of schemes concocted by desperate men for the robbery of our nation. Not only believing, but knowing the claims to be a fraud upon the Government, as well as upon the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, we earnestly ask the defeat of the joint resolutions referred to.

P. PITCHLYNN,
ISRAEL FOLSOM.

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that my only object is this: if these things are true, as alleged by the chiefs of the nation, then these claims should not be paid. And if the gentleman does not know of their falsity, then that is a good reason why this bill should at least be referred to a committee.

Mr. WINDOM. If the House will bear with me for three or five minutes, I will make a statement, and then if they desire to refer this bill they can do so.

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that the certificate of Governor Pitchlynn in reference to loyalty would go just about as far with me as the certificate of Jeff. Davis for the same purpose. Jeff. Davis was once president of what was known as the southern confederacy. This Pitchlynn was governor of one of those nations during the rebellion, and I believe was himself a rebel like Jeff. Davis. Yet he comes before this House to certify that these are not loyal Indians who make these claims. I think that the report of the committee shows conclusively that the commission could not sit in the heart of this Indian country, for the reason that these disloyal Indians were so determined to prevent proof being taken under this treaty that it was dangerous for any loyal Indian to make his claim before the commission.

Now, a single word further in reference to the manner in which these Indians were treated. I will read from the testimony of one of them, as a sample of the testimony of a great many of them, showing the treatment these loyal persons received at the hands of the disloyal. Yet these disloyal persons are here to-day whispering in the ears of members of Congress that these claims are dishonest and should not be paid. Every gentleman who allows himself to be misled by any such statements, and votes against this bill, will put himself upon the side of these disloyal persecutors of loyal Indians. I will read the evidence of one of the witnesses, and then the House can dispose of the matter as they shall see fit:

"Sha-lo-ye, an Indian woman, tells the tale of their terrible suffering in her testimony, as follows: she 'was one of the loyal Indians driven from the nation in 1861 by rebel Choctaws and Chickasaws; there were a great many started; we were very badly scared because they had run in among us and tied our men because they were friendly to the United States. If we had not joined in with the United States the rebels would not have troubled us. We left everything when they tied our men; we left our homes in a great hurry; many of us had not time to get our ponies and walked, old and young; many of us had no shoes; tied rags around our feet. We heard the northern Army was coming, and started to meet it for protection. The rebel Indians followed us and fought us as soon as we started; they tied and whipped two men because they were friendly with the United States. They fought us four times; the fourth time they scattered us and took a great many of our people back; two were killed, twenty-six were captured by the rebels in the last fight. A great many little children were frozen to death in their mother's arms; one woman froze to death; many grown people were frosted; some of them lost their feet; they could be tracked in the snow by the blood from their feet; many of our people died from starvation; I was five days without anything to eat. We got to Kansas after Christmas; it was very cold, snow very deep. A great many died after we got to Kansas from their sufferings during this trip."

The sufferings of these Indians, thus driven out from their homes, were almost intolerable. They were matters of public record at the time, and are not exaggerated by the witness in the statement which I have read.

Now, when this treaty was made, condoning the past offenses of these rebels, they agreed to pay for the damages they had inflicted. This bill proposes the same thing. I feel no particular interest in it, further than that I desire to see the stipulations of the treaty carried out.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would ask the gentleman if this matter has not been fully investigated by a committee of the Senate?

Mr. WINDOM. It has been; and it was also investigated in the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives. We believed it to be a thoroughly just and proper claim. However if the House desire to refer the bill they can do so; but in doing so they will postpone the payment of these claims for probably six or eight months, and in the mean time these Indians will starve. I now call the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and there were—ayes 35, noes 39; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. SCOTFIELD and WINDOM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-one, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move that the bill be ordered to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs when appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 96) to establish a port of delivery at Chester, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. ORTH: The petition of E. H. Baldwin and others, pilots in United States Navy, praying for relief.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 27, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force in the Patent Office, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that it had passed the bill of the Senate No. 80 to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 63) placing the solicitor and assistant solicitor of the Court of Claims in the Department of the Attorney General, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to permit a telegram to be read at the desk which I received last evening from the general manager of the Union Pacific railroad, giving some information in reference to the subject under discussion yesterday morning. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the following telegram:

New York, March, 1867.

Work has not been suspended on the Union Pacific railroad west of Omaha. Extreme cold weather and snow prevents laying track, but we were never doing more in accumulating material and getting it to the end of the track. We have now on hand the iron and ties for one hundred and fifty miles, and I will pledge myself to complete two miles a day for the first one hundred working days after the frost is out of the ground. Any investigation can only result to our credit, for we have built more road in a given time than was ever done before, and propose accomplishing more this year. We are not asking any legislation.

THOMAS C. DURANT,

Vice President Union Pacific Railroad.

General THAYER, United States Senate.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise to present certain papers which I hold in my hand in relation to the case of Philip F. Thomas, a gentleman whose credentials were presented to the Senate a few days ago, and referred to the Judiciary Committee of this body for examination. When that matter was before the Senate many members of this body objected to the reference, because they said there was nothing specific alleged against Mr. Thomas into which it was proper to ask the Judiciary Committee to inquire. It is very true that at that particular time there was nothing very definite before this body in regard to the gentleman. I now ask leave of the Senate to present, for the purpose of referring it to the committee, the annual statement of the Bank of Commerce in New York, dated March 12, 1862, addressed to their shareholders. In order to show what the character of this communication is, the Senate will allow me to read a passage from it. The statement is made out and signed by the president and cashier of the Bank of Commerce, and in the document they observe:

"Up to the close of December of the eventful year 1860 the interest on the stocks of the United States falling due on the 1st of January succeeding had been, for the first time, left unprovided for by both Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury, and Philip F. Thomas, his temporary successor in that office. No efficient measures to make seasonable provision therefor had been taken by either, and the funds in the Treasury here"—

"which might and should have been reserved to be applied to the payment of this interest, were drawn and appropriated for other purposes at the last hour."

"This was evidently a wicked and treasonable plot to dishonor the credit of the United States by default in the payment of interest on its stocks by neglecting to provide for the arrears due to the Army and Navy and the civil and diplomatic list, including those due to members of Congress then in session."

"The success of this would have caused great confusion in public affairs and disastrous embarrassment to the Government, and it became manifest that instant, united efforts were required to defeat it."

"This institution for itself, and several of its directors, for their own account, promptly assumed a large share of an immediate advance, by such banks and capitalists as had united in the emergency, to the United States Treasury of $5,000,000 upon an absolute condition"—

Mark the language—

"upon an absolute condition of the payment of the interest, due the next day, upon the United States stocks. Others doubtless would have participated in this loan could they have been consulted; but so carefully had this treacherous scheme been kept from public sight, and so late was it discovered, that it was only by the use of the telegraph that a timely provision could be made at last."

This is an official statement of the two principal officers of that very wealthy institution, in which Mr. Thomas, as Secretary of the Treasury, is very plainly implicated in what they call a treasonable attempt to discredit the paper of the Government by neglecting willfully and guiltily to provide for the payment of the interest; indeed, for having removed from New York the very money which had been previously placed there by the Government for the payment of the semi-annual interest upon the public stocks.

In order that it may be known to this body and to the country when Mr. Thomas became Secretary of the Treasury, I will take further leave to state that on the 10th of December, 1860, Howell Cobb resigned his seat in the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan as Secretary of the Treasury, and on the same day, the 10th of December, Philip F. Thomas was nominated to the Senate by President Buchanan as Secretary of the Treasury, and I presume confirmed on the same day, and most likely was commissioned under that same date. Thomas held that office until the 11th of January, 1861, when he, by a letter which has already been read in the Senate, and which is noticeable for its contents, resigned his place. In his letter of resignation he alleges as the main reason for so doing that he could not coöperate with the plan which Mr. Buchanan had then adopted of sending reinforcements to Fort Sumter for the purpose of defending it against an anticipated attack of the rebels.

This report is inclosed to me in a letter of the 26th of March, 1867, written by the president of the Bank of Commerce of New York, in which the President remarks:

"This bank in 1860 was neither the fiscal agent nor in correspondence with the officers of the Government at Washington. Consequently there are in its possession no such letters, checks, &c., as you ask for. The head of the Treasury Department was in direct communication with the Assistant Treasurer in this city."

I think the Assistant Treasurer at that time was Mr. Cisco—

"and it was in consequence of the representations made to banks and capitalists here by that loyal officer that steps were promptly taken to save the country from threatened discredit and disaster. Mr. Cisco informs me that his correspondence at that eventful period, if not now to be found in the Treasury offices at Washington, has doubtless been preserved at the sub-Treasury office in New York."

I invite the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary especially to the fact that in the sub-Treasury in the city of New York will be found all the necessary correspondence, letters, drafts, and entries which may be necessary, and will be necessary in the course of the investigation which the Senate have intrusted to their hands in reference to Mr. Thomas. That committee are authorized to send for persons and papers; and I hope and trust, and I believe, of course, and am happy in announcing my belief, that that committee will use the most energetic measures to procure the necessary evidence of the real status of Mr. Thomas at the date referred to in this report and in this letter and since that time. They will find it necessary probably to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for similar documents; and I have no doubt they will be able to find, if they will exert themselves, documents there which will go far to establish the serious charge made against Mr. Thomas in this report, that he was then guilty of acts of disloyalty to the Government of the United States. If it be true, as these gentlemen allege in this report, that Mr. Thomas had resorted to the scheme of discrediting the stocks of the Government of the United States by the non-payment of interest, thus endeavoring to cripple and destroy our credit at home and abroad, I say, for one, it was quite as culpable an act as if he had taken up arms and joined the rebels and waged war against his country.

I hope that the papers will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON. I have had placed in my hands a memorial signed by R. Z. Wilson, J. C. K. Milligan, and Henry O'Neill, on behalf of the synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church, in which they ask for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall acknowledge God as supreme and Christ as the Mediator and Governor of nations, and that the Bible may be taken as the supreme law. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was so referred.

Mr. WILSON. I also present the proceedings of a meeting of colored citizens held at Amelia Court-house, Virginia, covering a series of resolutions, in which they ask Congress to relieve from the disability to hold office Samuel S. Weisiger, in order that they may elect him a delegate to the convention that may be held in that State. They represent that he is a very loyal and earnest man, and a devoted friend of the colored people. I ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was so referred.

Mr. ROSS presented the petition of W. B. Edwards, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. CAMERON. A few days ago I introduced a joint resolution on the subject of the distribution of seeds in the South, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture for amendment. I now by the direction of the committee report a new resolution, and I ask that it be put upon its passage at once.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) authorizing the transfer of certain funds and providing for the purchase of seeds and their distribution in the southern States was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to transfer the sum of $50,000 from the funds in charge of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands, and placed to the credit of the Department of Agriculture, and provides that that sum shall be used under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the purchase of seeds of improved varieties of vegetables and cereals and their distribution in the southern States.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand from the Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture that this is entirely acceptable to the Freedmen's Bureau. The money is there. This is undoubtedly the best mode of helping the people of the South, by assisting them in their agricultural pursuits. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. CATTELL. I hope that the resolution which now comes from the Committee on Agriculture, with the unanimous indorsement of that committee, will be passed by the Senate. It is a simple proposition to expend $50,000 of the money which has already been appropriated, and is in the hands of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, for the purchase and distribution of vegetable and cereal seeds to the people of the southern States. I do not think the money could be expended in any form that would be so advantageous to the people of the South as to supply them with improved varieties of seeds in the present languishing condition of their agriculture. The Commissioner of Agriculture informs me that he is in the receipt of letters amounting to from two hundred and fifty to five hundred per day, a large portion of which come from the South, begging for donations of vegetable and cereal seeds. As the sum named in this resolution will go very far toward supplying that demand, and as it requires no new appropriation whatever, and is only taken from the fund already appropriated for the benefit of the southern people, I sincerely trust that the resolution will meet with the unanimous approval of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let me ask my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, if it is not too late to supply these seeds for the present year's use? It strikes me it is too late.

Mr. CATTELL. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Vermont, I will say that it is yet time for a very large number of the seeds and for many of the cereals for planting. Of course in some of the southern States for the earlier descriptions of vegetables it is late, and yet the distribution of such seeds as are now in season will be of very great advantage to the South. I do not propose to detain the Senate by any lengthened remarks on this question; but I hold in my hand a letter, an extract or two from which I should like to read, simply as showing the anxiety on the part of the South, and their destitution in regard to this very important subject. It is a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Agriculture by a most excellent and worthy lady residing in North Carolina, who has been the instrument of doing very much good in her locality, a member of the society of Friends. An extract or two from this letter will illustrate my point. She writes:

"I have a record of one hundred and ten families supplied with a liberal assortment of the seeds, and often I was too much burdened to enter the names of others who were furnished. Old men, feeble women, and little children, white and colored, have walked miles to procure a supply. I have taken pains in a prudent manner to impress on the minds of the people that these are sent gratis by our Government for our relief and encouragement."

"Before I wrote to thee on the subject of corn, one poor man came thirty miles to inquire if there was any 'charity corn' deposited at any point on the railroad."

I only give these two extracts of this letter as an illustration of how badly these things are needed in the southern country. I do not think the amount named here could be better expended in any earthly way than in the distribution of seeds in that country. I will only say, and I believe the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture will concur with me, that this resolution met the unanimous approbation of the committee, is indorsed by the Agricultural Department, and if it shall be passed, the money will at once be put to use.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was not aware that this resolution was to be offered; but a few days ago, in conversation with General Howard, he expressed to me the importance of this measure, and what a great relief it would be to the South, and also stated that, although it was late, it was not too late for a contribution of seeds to the South to be of great service to the country.

Mr. POMEROY. I would not throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of this resolution; but $50,000 seems like a very small amount for supplying seeds to such a destitute portion of the country. I do not know whether they have any funds on hand that could be applied to this purpose; but I know that this is a very small amount for the purpose contemplated. I was once in a situation myself where I had to distribute $50,000 worth to a mere Territory, which amount was very generously contributed by the State of New York, and although it did good immeasurable, still $50,000 was a small supply even for that people; and to think of undertaking to do this with $50,000 for the whole South looks to me like only a drop in the bucket.

Mr. CATTELL. I reply to the Senator from Kansas that doubtless it is a small sum, but even $50,000 will do a very great deal of good, and the Committee on Agriculture did not feel disposed to ask for a very large sum. I am thankful to my colleague from New Jersey for mentioning General Howard's name and his commendation of the purpose of this resolution. Yesterday General Howard sent a gentleman from the South to the Commissioner of Agriculture with a letter urging him to supply him for himself and his neighbors with the necessary seeds, particularly of the vegetables. The Commissioner informs me, and also was compelled to inform the gentleman, that the stock was already about exhausted, and that he was able to do but very little for him. While I thank the Senator from Kansas for his hearty cooperation in this measure, I would rather not risk the failure of its passage in the other House by asking for a larger sum. I shall therefore be glad to have the resolution passed as it stands.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to know whether General Howard approves of this diversion of the fund. If so, I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. CAMERON. I will reply to the Senator from Minnesota that the Commissioner of Agriculture told me it was entirely agreeable to the Freedmen's Bureau. This is one of those questions which I did not think it was necessary to say a word about. It appeals at once not only to the heart but the judgment of every man of intelligence. To give these people the means of work is extending much better charity than giving money. Fifty thousand dollars expended in the distribution of seeds will be a great deal better than $1,000,000 sent down there to be distributed in charities. It will stimulate men to work; and make them feel proud of their own exertions. The resolution takes no money from the Treasury; it merely transfers this sum from what has already been appropriated. I think it is hardly necessary to utter a word on the subject.

Mr. FOWLER. This amount, small as it is, will be of great advantage, I know. The recent terrible floods in a portion of my State have deprived the people of the opportunity of getting a crop unless they get some aid in this way. Small as the sum is, it will be of very great advantage, and it will be much better expended in this way than if expended in provisions.

Mr. MORTON. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture that reported this resolution. I believe that the expenditure of $50,000 in sending seeds and plants to the southern people will do them more good than the expenditure of $1,000,000 in buying and sending them food. It will enable them to raise their own provision.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARBAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 97) supplementary to the act to incorporate The Newsboys' Home, and providing for the relief of certain minor children in the District of Columbia, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that that bill will be put on its passage now.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to hear it read first.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. JOHNSON objected to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask whether one objection carries it over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly, on the day on which it is reported.

Mr. SUMNER. After it has been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was read for information.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Louisiana, praying for aid in the rebuilding and repairing of the broken and dilapidated levees of the Mississippi river, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 116) to guaranty the payment of certain bonds to be issued under the authority of the Government of the State of Louisiana for the purpose of building and repairing levees in said State. The bill and report were ordered to be printed, and on motion of Mr. HENDERSON, were recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 106) fixing the time at which the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, shall go into effect, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 44) directing an examination and estimate to be made of the cost of reconstructing the levees of the Mississippi river, reported it without amendment.

REMOVAL OF INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. THAYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 47) in relation to the removal of Indian tribes, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. It will take but a few moments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which provides that it shall not be lawful to remove or to relocate any Indian tribe not specifically authorized by law or treaty stipulation, and no public money or fund held in trust for Indians is to be used for the removal of any Indian tribe from one location to another unless specifically appropriated by law for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution strikes me from its reading as a very good one; but it is a very strange state of affairs that such a law is necessary. It simply says that unless a law authorizes the Indians to be removed it shall not be done. If there is any necessity for the passage of such a resolution it certainly ought to be passed. I notice that it is stated in the newspapers that a gentleman whom we have rejected as commissioner of Indian Affairs is now in the western country making treaties with a great number of Indian tribes, which are to be sent here and acted upon. If the Senator will go so far as to say that no Indian treaty shall hereafter be made except in pursuance of law, I should like it much better. I do not wish to embarrass the resolution; but if the Senator wishes to give it strength and at the same time do a great public service, I think he had better attach such a provision to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest whether it would not be better to add a provision repealing all laws authorizing the making of Indian treaties?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should be very glad to do that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that a great deal of money has been expended in that way by the working of some law that I know nothing about, said to be on the statute-book.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to make that amendment, I do not think it will embarrass the resolution, and it really will do a great public service, that no Indian treaty shall hereafter be made except in pursuance of law.

Mr. POMEROY. No treaty is made now except in pursuance of law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to have a law authorizing the making of the treaty. The old practice, let me say to the Senate, was first to ask Congress for an appropriation to authorize a treaty. That was the old custom. Now they make these treaties without any previous appropriation and without any previous law, and the result is that they are sent here, and the first thing we know they are confirmed, and then we are compelled to appropriate money to carry them into effect. If we provide that the first step shall originate with Congress, that no treaty shall be made unless Congress specifically authorize a particular treaty to be made, we shall have no more of these Indian treaties. They are now making treaties to buy new reservations for the Indians in Kansas, who have been transported there at great expense, and who are now rich, prosperous, and happy in many cases, taking them out further and further into the remote wilderness, and establishing them in new reservations, in order that—what? That the white men in Kansas may enjoy the Indian lands. That is all there is about it.

Mr. POMEROY. That is not all there is about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is very much the case. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That no Indian treaties shall hereafter be made except in pursuance of express provision of law, and after an appropriation has been made therefor.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Ohio is pretty familiar with the statutes, and yet he seems to have overlooked the statute of 1863, by which we not only authorized, but required the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to make these very treaties that he complains of. Censure is sought to be cast on the Department for making treaties without provision of law, when there is an express provision of law on the statute-book requiring them to make them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is a provision to repeal that.

Mr. POMEROY. If it passes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It ought to.

Mr. POMEROY. It will not repeal it until after it becomes a law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire what effect this resolution will have upon the condition of the Indians. In the State where I live there are different reservations set apart for the use of the Indians. It is desirable perhaps to remove the Indians from one reservation to another, to consolidate the different tribes or remnants of tribes upon one reservation, and that will enable the white people to occupy and use the reservation abandoned or vacated in that way by the Indians so removed. I do not desire to have any resolution passed here in general terms affecting the relations between the white men and the Indians without knowing exactly what its effect or its extent is to be. Now, I know in one case, so far as the Umatilla reservation is concerned, the Indians there occupy a valuable tract of country, and its occupation is very much desired by the white people surrounding the Indians; and it has been proposed that some arrangement be made by which those Indians may be removed to the reservation at the Warm Springs, or some other reservation, where they can be placed and be as comfortable as they are where they are now located, and that the valuable country they now possess may be opened for the use of white people. This resolution is in such general terms that I am not able to appreciate its effect, and I should like to know more exactly what it means.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Nebraska, [Mr. THAYER,] tells me that this amendment of mine will lead to debate, and as the object of his resolution, so far as it goes, is a very good one, and I hope we shall pass it, I will withdraw my amendment and will probably present the question at the next session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. THAYER. I think I can make the object of this resolution sufficiently clear, so that there will be no objection to it. It has one distinct object. There have been instances where tribes of Indians have been moved about, in the absence of any treaty, from place to place, having no permanent abiding place. It is simply to stop that, and to declare that no tribe shall be moved until a treaty has been previously made and a reservation selected, and that no funds shall be expended in such removal until a treaty has been effected and sanctioned by the Senate. That is the sole object of the resolution. It does not affect any previous law. It is to prevent expense to the Government and to protect the Indians. If they are to be put on reservations, it is to let them remain where they are until those reservations are selected, and they can be moved by giving them a permanent home. That is the only object of the resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MANUFACTURE OF BUTTONS.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 52) to exempt certain articles used in the manufacture of buttons from increased duty; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. At the closing hours of the last session there was a mistake made, which is evident to every one who has had his attention called to the subject, and this resolution is to correct that mistake. The circumstances are thoroughly familiar to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and I have introduced this resolution on his suggestion. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. For many years a provision has existed in the tariff laws allowing lastings to be imported fit for shoes and boots, and for the manufacture of buttons, when imported in the shape, form, and style suited exclusively for those purposes, at a lesser rate than that imposed upon the same goods in the piece; that is, at the rate of ten per cent. It was found that a portion of those engaged in the manufacture of shoes and boots had imported lastings in the piece, taken them to Canada in bond, and there cut them up and brought them back again when they were only subject to ten per cent., while many of the manufacturers of shoes and boots were not able to avail themselves of such an evasion, and it was working a great amount of inequality; and therefore those engaged in the manufacture of shoes and boots desired that the usual rate of duty should be imposed upon all lastings so as not to permit that imported for shoes and boots to come in at any less rate than that for any other purposes. The suggestion was made by the member from Massachusetts representing the largest amount of shoe and boot interest in the country [Mr. ALLEY] that this should be required, and he showed me a proposition which I did not carefully examine myself, but he said it only applied to shoes and boots. I suggested to him at the time that it ought not to apply to lastings imported in that shape for the manufacture of buttons, and he told me that it did not; but it is found that the department rules that it not only applies to such goods when imported in the form adapted for the purpose of shoes and boots, but also for buttons, and it goes therefore much too far, and is going to work ruin and disaster to that branch of business, the button manufacture of this country.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust we shall not pass this resolution now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If objection be made it cannot be passed at this time. The question is on taking it up. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

SETTLEMENT OF OFFICERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. THAYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and as several Senators have asked me to urge its passage now, I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. HOWE. Let it be read at length for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. It proposes to instruct the Second Auditor to audit and settle the accounts of line officers of the Army to the extent of their pay for their services as such, due them from the United States, in all cases where they shall make affidavit of their inability to make their monthly report or returns by reason of their having been prisoners in the hands of the enemy, or any accident or casualty of war, they have been unable to account for property in their possession.

Mr. HOWE. I will inquire if that has been reported by any committee?

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir; the Committee on Military Affairs have had it under consideration and unanimously concur in reporting it for passage. It is simply to provide for a case like this: where an officer was captured and retained as a prisoner of war it was utterly impossible for him to make his monthly reports, for instance, of arms for which he was responsible; and the rule of the Department is that the paymaster cannot pay the officer the balance of pay due him at the time of muster-out from the time of the last payment until he has made all these monthly reports. There are many cases where officers have been prisoners, and it was utterly impossible for them to make those reports. They are not cases where any property has been lost at all; but it is simply to authorize the paymaster to pay them the amount due them at the time of muster-out.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution. There ought not to be any general argument upon it until it is taken up. Is there any objection to its present consideration?

Mr. HOWE. I do not make any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. I was about to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska what practical difficulty there could be in the way of paying those officers arising from that cause? I was about to inquire of him if in the case of the capture and imprisonment of an officer in command of a company, for instance, some other officer does not take his place in command of that company and make the regular monthly reports?

Mr. THAYER. That is true; but the rule is applied, in this way: that the officer himself must make up all his reports. The application of the rule is very rigid. This resolution proposes to relax it so far as to enable an officer, for instance, who makes affidavit that it is not in his power to cover that period when he was a prisoner or absent from the company in hospital, to receive the balance of his pay. I know that the rule of the Department has worked hardship in a great many worthy cases.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the rule and usage of the Department to be very different. I understand that before the paymaster can refuse payment to an officer by reason of his not making his returns there must be an order of the War Department suspending his pay as a penalty for not making the returns, and that that order is never issued except where the returns are held back and there is no explanation of the reason why they are held back; but a paymaster cannot impose this penalty, nor refuse this payment, unless he does it under an order from the War Department suspending the pay of the officer. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. THAYER. He must present his returns to the Department under the regulations before they will pay him the balance due him. The pay of all officers is stopped when they are mustered out until they have made these returns.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the law and regulations to require, not that Captain A or Captain B shall make a return, but that the officer in command of such and such companies shall make returns, and if any officer makes the return, the regulation of the Department is satisfied. It is the other clause of the resolution which I suspect is the operative one. I should like to have the resolution read again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. HOWE. It is the last clause of the resolution, I suspect, which is the important one. That requires the accounting officers of the Treasury to accept an affidavit of any officer charged with the custody of any military property; an affidavit to the fact that by accident he has been deprived of the property as a sufficient accounting for the property. That involves a very serious consideration. It is a question that I am not really prepared to advise the Senate about; but I am satisfied that that is the gist of the resolution before the Senate. If the Committee on Military Affairs are decidedly of the opinion that it is safe to accept such an affidavit in all cases, I shall acquiesce in their judgment; but it is a pretty radical movement, I think.

Mr. WILSON. There is very little change made by it any way. I did not see the absolute necessity of its passage; but at the same time, if it will contribute in any degree (and it is the opinion of some gentlemen that it will) to bring about settlements that ought to be made, I think we ought to pass it. We have gone through a great war. A great many officers have been captured and have lost property for which they were responsible under the circumstances, and others who have not been captured have lost it in the field, and there is quite a number of these accounts to be settled, and it is very hard and very oppressive to these men. Integrity of character is of no account in their settlement. The men who have done their whole duty in regard to the matter are just in as hard a condition as the men who have shirked it. It is now two years since the cessation of actual hostilities, and these accounts ought to be closed up; and I think if this resolution will contribute to that end it ought to pass. It may be that it may facilitate the settlement of the accounts of some person who may have acted dishonestly; but I take it there will be very little of that character. There are men perhaps more familiar with it than I am, at any rate who are more familiar with the condition of officers' service and the hazards of it and the losses, who are very anxious that this measure should pass and that those officers should be relieved. I do not personally know any one who is involved in it; but I think it can do no harm to pass the resolution, and these gentlemen say it will facilitate these settlements, and if it does I think it ought to pass.

Mr. HOWE. I think I can understand very well from the explanation submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts that it will facilitate settlements very much; but it seems to me it will facilitate them too much. I supposed there was some regulation of the Army now by which where property really was lost through the casualties of war a settlement could be effected. I am not prepared to say that there is any such regulation. It would seem very strange to me that there was not; but I am very clearly of the opinion on a moment's reflection that such a resolution as this ought not to find a place on the orders of the Department or the statutes. It provides that if the officer will make an affidavit simply of the loss, that is to be taken as true, and the accounting officer is to take it and settle his accounts. If any such provision is to be made, it seems to me there should be discretion given to the accounting officers of the Treasury to credit or to discredit this affidavit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the law now.

Mr. HOWE. The officer should be required to prove to the satisfaction of the accounting officers the facts of the loss. It is said that that is the law. It seems to me to be all the law there ought to be. If he cannot satisfy, not by his own affidavit, but by proofs, the accounting officers of the Treasury that this property actually has been lost, there is no reason why we should direct the accounting officers to accept the affidavit as a verity and pay on that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My attention was called to this joint resolution by one of my colleagues in the House of Representatives, who attaches some importance to it. The resolution, it will be observed by the Senator from Wisconsin, only applies to the pay of officers, not to the settlement of their accounts otherwise. Officers who were captured and in prison, or who from any casualty in battle or otherwise were unable to make their monthly returns, have their pay withheld from them. It seems to me that is wrong.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand the fact to be so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is so, as I understand it. That seems to me to be wrong. It is sometimes very difficult to find persons who can prove the fact that they were imprisoned. Now, ought their pay—that is the extent of this resolution—to be stopped and they not have it because they were unable to make their monthly returns? If you will look closely at the resolution it will be seen that it does not authorize the settlement of any other accounts or discharge them from any liability for property; but the resolution is simply to authorize the Second Auditor—

"to audit and settle the accounts of line officers of the Army"—

It only applies to line officers—

"to the extent of their pay for their services as such"—

That is all—

"in all cases where they shall make affidavit of their inability to make their monthly report or returns."

It seems to me that the fact that they did not make a monthly return because they were captured or because of some casualty of war, if it is sworn to by them, ought to discharge them from that act of not making that return, so that they might get their pay, and let the question as to what property they are responsible for be settled afterward. Do not withhold the pittance that the Government pays them, because by reason of being imprisoned or some other conflict of arms they were unable to make a monthly report, when they swear that it was impossible for them to do it. I think that ought to be prima facie sufficient evidence. It seems to me no great hardship can result from it.

Mr. YATES. I happen to know a case precisely in point illustrating the position already stated by my colleague. A lieutenant in the Army was detailed to take care of cattle, and twenty-three of them escaped by a stampede and went into the enemy's country. It was utterly impossible for him to recover them; but there were no witnesses to that transaction. He was detailed as a mere lieutenant over twenty hands who had in charge these cattle, and there are no witnesses now who can testify as to the facts in the case. The amount in that case was nearly one thousand dollars, and his pay is now detained to cover that amount, and it seems to me, as his affidavit is the only evidence that can possibly be produced of the fact in question, it ought to be received. I think that this individual case now pending and undecided shows the importance of this resolution.

Mr. MORTON. This resolution is of practical importance to a great many officers who were in prison in the South. It simply provides the evidence that shall be required and shall be sufficient in a case of this kind. There is a method of settlement in just such cases, but it is circuitous, and it requires evidence that often cannot from the nature of the case be furnished. I think it is important that this resolution should pass.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say that as the law now stands it reads in this way:

"That in settling the accounts of the commanding officer of a company for clothing and other military supplies, the affidavit of any such officer may be received to show the loss of vouchers, or company books, or any matter or circumstance tending to prove that any apparent deficiency was occasioned by unavoidable accident, or lost in actual service, without any fault on his part, or that the whole or any part of such clothing and supplies had been properly and legally used and appropriated; and such affidavit may be considered as evidence to establish the facts set forth, with or without other evidence, as may seem to the Secretary of War just and proper under the circumstances of the case."

That is the existing law, and under that law it is certainly the fact that a great many officers who have lost property by the casualties of war, by capture or otherwise in the field, are unable to make their monthly returns and take the oaths required. It is proposed by this resolution to go a little further than this law in order to hasten these settlements. There cannot be a doubt that as it now stands it operates oppressively upon men who have been in the service during this war and have lost property. It is possible that some men may not have been honest, but a great many honest officers, officers whose courage and devotion on the field made them prisoners of war or exposed them to extra hazards, have lost property and are unable to obtain their pay. This goes to the extent of settling their pay; but it does not settle their accounts in regard to these vouchers which they cannot make. That is the fact.

Mr. HOWE. Now, I think the real character of this proposition can be understood very easily. As the law is, the officer of a company who is charged with the custody and safe-keeping of the company property can submit his affidavit to the accounting officers and can submit with it any other testimony available, and if the accounting officers believe the case thus made out, there is full authority in the law as it stands for them to settle the account. This resolution, therefore, can only operate upon cases where the officer has made his affidavit, has submitted it to the accounting officers, and the accounting officers disbelieve it, either because it is improbable, or because it is not supported, or because it is contradicted by other evidence. In all these cases this resolution is mandatory, or will be if enacted, upon the accounting officers; it compels them to accept the affidavit as true, let the actual facts within the knowledge of the accounting officers be such as they may. Now, Mr. President, I object to that. It does seem to me unreasonable. If the affidavit of the officer is true, it will very likely appear probable to the accounting officer, and he, by the existing law, is authorized to give credit to it if it convinces his judgment. Nobody asserts that the accounting officers administer the law oppressively or illiberally. All you have to do is to convince their judgment, and they are authorized to consider the bare affidavit of the officer charged. I will read the law once more:

"That in settling the accounts of the commanding officer of a company for clothing and other military supplies, the affidavit of any such officer may be received to show the loss of vouchers or company books, or any matter or circumstance tending to prove that any apparent deficiency was occasioned by unavoidable accident or loss in actual service, without any fault on his part, or that the whole or any part of such clothing and supplies had been properly and legally used and appropriated."

All these things may be shown by the affidavit of the officer in charge:

"And such affidavit may be considered as evidence to establish the facts set forth, with or without other evidence."

Mr. JOHNSON. It does not make it conclusive?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir:

"as may seem to the Secretary of War just and proper under the circumstances of the case."

The difference between the law as it now stands and the law as proposed by this resolution is, that the law now leaves the discretion in the Department to credit the affidavit or not, while the resolution as proposed commands the accounting officer to give full credit to it, no matter what other evidence there may be available to the Department. Now, sir, if it is the purpose of Congress to exempt these officers from all liability, just do so by a clean act, wipe the books right out; do not impose any conditions; do not impose upon them the necessity of going before the accounting officers and swearing to a state of facts which is already discredited, and therefore which there is reason to believe is not true; do not require them to perjure themselves; that is no satisfaction to the Government or to the people; just clear the books off and let them go. That is the manly thing to do if you are going to do anything in that direction. If you are going to do the just thing, you will let them stand on the law as it is.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope this resolution will lie over until to-morrow, and I make that motion. It is clear that we cannot act upon it now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not go over. That is a defeat of the measure.

Mr. CONNESS. It ought to be defeated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me not. I think altogether too much importance is attached to it. It applies simply to the pay of these officers.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator indulge me while I call his attention to the fact that that is all the security the Government has in the case of these officers. It has no other security if it relinquishes its hold on their pay.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They give bond.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Quartermasters and commissaries, I know, give bond.

Mr. HOWE. But these are line officers.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the resolution will go over, and I have submitted that motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be postponed. I am satisfied from what I have heard about it that something of this kind ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of this joint resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to amend that motion by adding, "and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Senate."

Mr. CONNESS. That cannot be done.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If I do not get it up now the bill will be lost.

Mr. CONNESS. Appropriation bills never fail.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It has got to go back to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not think that is in order. I will overrule that motion. The question is on postponing the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. THAYER. I should like to answer the position of the Senator from Wisconsin by referring to the law from which he read. It will take but a moment. The law is this:

"That in settling the accounts of the commanding officer of a company for clothing and other military supplies, the affidavit of any such officer may be received to show the loss of vouchers or company books, or any matter or circumstance tending to prove that an apparent deficiency was occasioned by unavoidable accident or loss in actual service, without any fault on his part, or that the whole or any part of such clothing and supplies had been properly and legally used and appropriated."

This resolution does not apply to those cases at all. I do not propose to relieve these officers on account of any loss of property; that is, to relieve them from any accountability. The resolution provides simply that when they come forward and swear that they cannot make up their monthly returns by reason of their having been prisoners or any casualty of war their pay shall not be withheld from them. I can tell the Senate that there are hundreds of officers as true and faithful as ever served who have been kept out of their pay ever since the war closed by no fault of their own, but by the casualties of war alone, by exposing themselves in the field. They are deprived of the pay which is honestly due them on account of the rigid construction of the Department. I grant you the Secretary of War has the discretion to relax the rule, but he cannot undertake to flood his Department with these cases when they properly belong to the Second Auditor of the Treasury. This is simply to authorize the Second Auditor to receive the affidavit as conclusive in regard to the fact that they cannot make these returns. I will not trouble the Senate further on the question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the motion to postpone does not prevail, I think the resolution can be amended so as to satisfy all parties, by making it read, that in all cases where such Auditor shall be satisfied by the affidavit of such line officer, or otherwise, then the payment shall be made. That would fix it, so that if he was satisfied with the character of the line officer the affidavit would be sufficient; otherwise he would say that he must have further testimony. If the motion to postpone does not prevail, I shall move to amend the resolution in that way.

Mr. CONNESS. That places it entirely in the discretion of the accounting officers to pay immense sums of money. It appears to me the law is right just as it is. It provides that the affidavit of the officer shall be corroborative testimony. I do not see any more just way to place it than that. I hope the question will be taken on the motion.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that this Government will have to legislate to relieve these officers, as it will have to relieve several in the pay department. The Paymaster General has strongly indorsed a measure to relieve certain officers of that department who have paid out money to soldiers and paid it honestly; but we have not done it. Those men are held and will be held until we pass a measure for their relief. These officers now, after the expiration of two years, will have to be relieved by legislation, or they will never be relieved at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the resolution until to-morrow.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose we shall have to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONNESS. If there is any prospect of agreeing on a proper amendment I will withdraw the motion to postpone.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think there will be any difficulty in that.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator from New Jersey has prepared an amendment which I will accept.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the motion. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be considered as withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWE. But the record shows that there is no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that objection is made, the presence of a quorum must be ascertained.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be ascertained by a count.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (after a count.) A quorum is present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out in lines six and seven the words "they shall make affidavit" and inserting "such Auditor shall be satisfied by the affidavit of such line officer, or otherwise;" so that the resolution will read:

That the Second Auditor do, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to audit and settle the accounts of line officers of the Army to the extent of their pay for their services as such, due them from the United States, in all cases where such Auditor shall be satisfied, by the affidavit of such line officer, or otherwise, of their inability to make their monthly report or return, by reason of their having been prisoners in the hands of the enemy, or any accident or casualty of war they have been unable to account for property in their possession.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the word "line" before "officer" in the amendment had better be left out. You do not want it used twice. It only applies to line officers. "Affidavit of such officer" would be better.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The object of putting in "line officer" was merely to distinguish him from the other officer named, the Auditor.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the resolution provides only for line officers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

STEAM-BOILERS MADE OF CAST STEEL.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for an experimental test of steam-boilers made of cast steel, with a view to a diminution of danger to life and to an improvement of commercial and industrial agencies; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I also present a communication on the same subject, which I ask to have referred to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, to report it with certain amendments; and as the bill must go back to the House, I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In the last line of the fourth section of the amendment I move to strike out "nine" and insert "twelve," and to add at the end of the section the words "for the period of three months ending June 30, 1867, and for the year ending June 30, 1868."

I will explain the effect of this. As the amendment comes to us from the House it provides for the salary of the Commissioner of Education and his clerks for one year. There should be a provision made for one year and three months. This makes the additional appropriation for the three months, and also specifies the periods which were not specified in that amendment. The House amendment appropriates the salaries without defining the period for which salaries are paid. That is the effect of the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the reading of the first House amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken on the amendments separately if it is required.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment of the House is to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That section ten of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, shall not be construed to allow a greater compensation for the publication of the laws passed by Congress and executive proclamations and treaties in the papers of the District of Columbia than is provided by law for such publications in other papers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The amendment does not strike out the section. The Clerk will see that he is mistaken. It adds an additional section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can explain to the Senator that the first message was sent here wrong. The House propose to strike that out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is not the record sent here.

Mr. SHERMAN. The record was changed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The record as it came to the committee is as I have stated. It was to add an additional section, to which the House had no objection. Now, it seems that the House proposition is to strike out our section. I hope that will be disagreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to inquire simply whether the words read are struck out by the House amendment or are inserted by it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They were put in here and are struck out by the House.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then if we non-concur in the House amendment the words read will remain in the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The Secretary read the next amendment of the House of Representatives, to add as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of section seven of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, as relates to the publication of the treaties and laws of the United States be, and the same is hereby, extended to the States, and to the Territories; and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, upon receiving notice of the designation of newspapers under the act aforesaid and this section, promptly to furnish to such newspapers authentic copies of the treaties and laws of the United States to be published as aforesaid: Provided, That it shall be lawful to print the laws and treaties of the United States as aforesaid in three newspapers in Louisiana.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will simply state the effect of that amendment. The act of March 2, 1867, here referred to, provides for the designation by the Clerk of the House of newspapers for the publication of the treaties and laws of the United States in the insurrectionary States. This amendment of the House extends that provision to papers in all the other States and Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sorry the Committee on Appropriations agreed to this amendment. I have no objection to the Clerk of the House designating the papers to publish the laws. I think, perhaps, it is a duty more properly imposed on the Clerk of the House, or some branch of the legislative power, than on the Secretary of State. There is no special reason why the Secretary of State should designate the papers to publish the laws. It is very proper that Congress itself should select the persons who are to name the papers for the publication. I have no objection to the amendment thus far; but the effect of the proposition as it stands is to double the cost of the publication of the laws. A special provision was made for the southern States, because in the present condition of affairs there it is difficult to get papers to publish the laws at the old rates, one dollar per page, and therefore it was provided at the last session by an amendment to an appropriation bill that the price for publishing the laws in those States should be doubled, and the Clerk of the House was authorized to designate two papers in each of those States to publish the laws. Now, the effect of this amendment is to double the price paid for the publication of the laws in all the States of the Union. There is no occasion for it. The newspapers in the northern States are willing to publish them at the old rates. They are generally anxious to do it, because they publish the great body of the laws at any rate as matters of news, and they are glad to get the three or four hundred dollars additional per session that is paid to them for it. There is no necessity, there is no demand for the increase of price, and I therefore think the amendment of the House ought to be modified. I have no objection to the mode of designating the papers provided for by the House amendment; but I do not think the rate of pay ought to be increased. I move to amend the amendment by adding:

Provided, That the rate fixed by previous laws shall not be hereby increased.

Mr. POMEROY. Does that mean the rate fixed by the act of last session?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the previous laws. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the House of Representatives, as amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire if this amendment authorizes the Clerk of the House to designate newspapers in all the States to publish the laws.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the amendment.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The next amendment of the House of Representatives was to add as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, namely:

For stationery for the House of Representatives, $9,000.

For newspapers, $10,000.

For miscellaneous items, $10,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the expenses incurred by certain Indian delegations in visiting Washington city for the purpose of negotiating treaties, and in their return home, to wit:

For the Sioux of Lake Traverse, $10,000.

For the Sioux of the Upper Missouri, $20,000.

For the tribes residing in the State of Kansas, $15,000.

For the Chippewas of the Mississippi, $6,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator to explain his amendment and to state by what authority he offers it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose the Senator is quite aware of the authority from which it comes. It comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It will be remembered that a few days ago the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] offered a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and has been under the consideration of that committee. It was first sent to the Committee on Appropriations, but the honorable chairman of that committee reported it back and had it referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Committee on Indian Affairs desired to have further information on the subject. There was a letter from the Secretary of the Interior accompanying the request for the passage of the bill with which we were not exactly satisfied, and we sent to him for further information and for the items of expenditure. Those I hold in my hand. They have been laid before the Committee on Indian Affairs this morning. It is true we have not had the time to examine the subject as perhaps we ought to have done, but we are at the close of the session, and it is for the Senate to consider whether these expenses shall be paid or not. The matter was referred by the committee to the Senator from Kansas

[Mr. ROSS] and myself, with the authority to place it before the Senate if we saw fit. I have in my hand the Secretary's letter, and also the estimate of expenditure, which the Senate can have read if they desire to hear it. Instead of taking the figures as I found them in the bill offered by the Senator from Minnesota, I took the figures as they are contained in the items before me, and have thus changed the bill and presented it to the Senate in the shape in which this amendment is offered.

Now, Mr. President, one word in reference to this class of appropriations. So far as I am individually concerned, I can very distinctly state to the Senate that in my opinion, as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I shall at no future time report any such appropriations to the Senate, nor shall I ask the Senate at any future time to add such a provision as this to any appropriation bill. I am as much opposed to it as any Senator; but we find that an act of Congress was passed in 1863, which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations overlooked perhaps when he asked that the bill of the Senator from Minnesota be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which authorized treaties to be made by the President so far as the Kansas Indians are concerned; or rather there was a provision in the appropriation bill of 1863 which authorized the President to enter into treaty stipulations with all the tribes in Kansas who owned their lands in common; and by virtue of this treaty as they supposed the Department have cited the Indians of Kansas to appear, and the chiefs and head men have come, and they entered into treaty stipulations during the last Congress, and those treaties are now before the Committee on Indian Affairs for their action.

We are not yet prepared to report upon them favorably, for the reason that they involve an entire change in the condition of the Indian tribes in Kansas, and in fact propose a change in the entire Indian policy—a congregation of the Indians in the Indian Territory. For that reason we are not prepared just at this moment to report favorably upon those treaties. There are a great many good things in them. There are some other things of doubtful policy and expediency. However, those treaties will lay ultimately, no doubt, the foundation of a policy that must be adopted in the future.

The Committee on Indian Affairs is not responsible, I apprehend, for this expenditure. Whether it be right or not it is for the Senate to consider. These Indians have been brought here, so far at least as those from Kansas are concerned, by authority of law; and if any mistake has been made about it the Senate is as much responsible as anybody else. The law was passed in 1863. Whether the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has not transcended his authority in treating with the Indians who hold lands in Kansas in severalty is another thing; but surely he had a right to summon the Indians who hold in common by virtue of that law of Congress. And as a part of each tribe hold in common and a part of each tribe hold in severalty, I suppose, therefore, I may properly and legitimately say here in my place that the Secretary of the Interior had the right to summon those Indians here. Congress, under these circumstances, finds itself compelled, so far as the Kansas Indians are concerned, to make the appropriation so far as it goes to pay the actual expenses incurred.

Then there is a proposition to pay the expenses of the Sioux Indians of Lake Traverse. The honorable Senator from Minnesota understands much more about this matter than I do, and can make the explanation. There is a reason why a treaty ought to be made with these Sioux; but whether it was good policy to summon twenty-five or thirty Sioux to this city from the northern part of Minnesota to enter into a treaty is another thing; but they are here, they have been brought here, and it is for the Senate to say whether they will refuse to appropriate the money to pay the expenses incurred in bringing them here and now in taking them home or not. Some of it is expense incurred by reason of the sickness of two of the chiefs, who I believe have died since they left home.

Another item is for the Sioux of the Upper Missouri. The papers here explain that. There was no absolute authority of law for bringing them here; but they have been brought here, and a treaty has been perfected with them, which in all probability is a good treaty.

Now, in regard to the Chippewas of the Mississippi, an appropriation of $10,000 was asked. I desired the agent to itemize the accounts of every Indian who was brought here from the point of starting to Washington city, and what it would cost to take him back, each hotel bill, each item of railroad fare, and so on, so that I could begin to ascertain the correctness of the various items. I have examined the matter carefully. The agent presented the items, and on investigating them I find the amount to be $6,000 instead of $10,000, which was asked for, and so we have put the appropriation at $6,000. The Chippewas of the Mississippi are also in the State of Minnesota; and the Senator who offered the original bill, and who represents that State in part, will be able to explain to the Senate why that appropriation should be made.

The Committee on Indian Affairs are not responsible for these appropriations. They are rendered necessary in consequence of the Indians having been brought to this city to make treaties. It is for the Senate to determine whether it will violently break off this system now by refusing this appropriation, and thereby giving a hard lesson for the future, because it will be a terrible lesson. I do not know how the Indians are to get back, or whether you will make this appropriation, and provide for breaking up the system in the future, which must be broken up, and which the Committee on Indian Affairs is determined to break up so far as possible. We passed a resolution this morning that will go very far toward curtailing expenses of this character by saying that the department shall not remove an Indian tribe anywhere without first consulting with Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire whose money has been expended in transporting these Indians here? Has it been money belonging to private individuals or public money?

Mr. HENDERSON. The expenses in a great many cases have not been paid at all. The larger portion of them remain unpaid. The accounts, as I understand, have been kept, but they are yet to be paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Were not vouchers produced for these bills?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. RAMSEY. In their settlement under the appropriation of course vouchers will be produced.

Mr. HENDERSON. I presume in the settlement all that will be attended to. I have stated all the facts I know in reference to the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it:

And all laws allowing the President or the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to enter into treaties with any Indian tribes are hereby repealed, and no treaty shall hereafter be made with any tribe until an appropriation authorizing such treaty shall be made by law.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, has referred the Senate to me for an explanation of one of these items, the appropriation for the Sioux of Lake Traverse, just over the boundary line of Minnesota, in the Territory of Dakota. Before going into that item, however, I must say that I fear, from the apologetic speech of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, it may be supposed that there was some great wrong in all this. Why, Mr. President, from the earliest times it has been the practice of the Indian department to call the Indian chiefs here, instead of sending commissioners to their own locality, to make treaties with them. There is nothing wrong in that; there is great economy in it. If you had sent out delegates, escorted by troops, to either of these localities, to Kansas, to Lake Traverse, to the Upper Missouri, or to the Upper Mississippi, it would have cost the Government twice what the expense of making the treaty in this case amounted to. By one of these treaties, that with the Chippewas of the Mississippi, the Government, in the trade, has effected a gain of several million dollars. Delegations have been here representing some five or six or probably eight thousand Indians.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator say we have got the advantage in making a treaty with the Indians?

Mr. RAMSEY. I really think the advantage is about as great as I have stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it is a cruel outrage on the Indians.

Mr. RAMSEY. They are willing to make the arrangement, and desire to make it, nevertheless; but the Government has that advantage. It is now proposed to appropriate between fifty and sixty thousand dollars, which gentlemen appear to regard as an enormous sum, for bringing together the representatives of eight or ten thousand Indians of various tribes in different parts of the country. It seems to me that it is not very startling. It has been done time and again without any attention being called to it. It is really a great stroke of economy on the part of the Indian department to bring the chiefs here to make treaties. There is no novelty in it, and there is no occasion for any apology in the premises. It was a very proper thing and a very economical thing. Now, so far as regards the particular item of $15,000 expenditure for bringing here the chiefs and head men of the Lake Traverse tribe of Sioux Indians, I will say that this body of Sioux were friendly to the whites in the great massacre in 1862. There are some fifteen hundred or two thousand of them. They threw themselves between the hostile Indians and the whites, and no doubt saved many lives. It is within the recollection of the Senate that in that massacre, in the period of about ten days, eight hundred men, women, and children were slaughtered by the hostile Sioux.

These men withdrew from the body of the tribe, and, so far as they could, interposed their protection against the further massacre of our people. They withdrew to the plains of Dakota. The annuities of the whole body of the Sioux, the lower and the upper Sioux, the Sissetons, the Wahpatons, the Medawakantons, and Wahpakoata bands of Sioux were confiscated by the Government by an act of February or March, 1863, and the hostile Sioux were removed by the Government down on to the Missouri, somewhere about the mouth of the Niobrara. Notwithstanding this confiscation, the Government found it was necessary to support them to some extent, and they have from that time to this been in the habit of making an annual appropriation of about one hundred thousand dollars for their support. But these friendly Sioux, these men who, because of their protection to the white settlers at that time, have made themselves objects of hostility to the other Sioux, have remained without any annuities, any attention, or any care on the part of the Government through all these years. Now, the authorities of the State of Minnesota, the Governor, the Legislature, and the people generally, thought this was doing these friendly Indians a great wrong, and they asked the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to make a treaty with them in recognition of their kindness and their great service, and to make some provision for them for the future.

Again, there is a great deal of travel and transportation through northern Dakota and Minnesota to Montana, a region that is improving very rapidly. Over that country emigrant parties pass every year. With a view to giving them protection it has been thought advisable to call in the assistance of this body of Indians, to make them still more friendly, and call them in to the support of the Government. We have selected from among them a most efficient and valuable body of scouts for the protection of travelers. All these motives influenced the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to call these Indians here to make a treaty, and I say that if a commission had been sent out by our Government to the Indian country to make treaty it would have cost two or three times as much as is asked for here. In regard to the Chippewas of the Mississippi I think they have paid very well for all we appropriate in the large body of lands we get; but the item of $6,000 for them is hardly worth talking about.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This amendment is in substance the bill of the Senator from Minnesota which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. There was no explanation accompanying the bill which seemed to justify an examination of it by that committee. We were not aware of the act of 1863 referred to, which it is said in some sense justifies what has been done in this case, if justification were necessary. The honorable Senator from Minnesota says that has been the custom time out of mind. I do not know how that is. All I mean to say is that the committee had no data from which they could act on this question. It seemed a proper subject, therefore, in their judgment to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. They accordingly reported the bill back, asking to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Now, I confess, independent of any custom or usage on this subject, of which I know nothing, that something of this kind would seem to have been contemplated by the provision of the appropriation bill of 1863 which has been alluded to. It seems to have been contemplated by that provision that the President of the United States should open treaty negotiations with the Kansas tribes with a view to their removal to some other country. This expense is incurred, it is said, in pursuance of the provisions of that act. If that is so, then there would seem to be some obligation on the part of the Government to make the appropriation necessary to meet the actual expenses; but again, on that subject the Committee on Appropriations had no sort of data from which they could judge as to what was proper in the premises, and I have no opinion now upon that subject. I understand the honorable Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to have a large bundle of papers here, estimates, &c. I understand him to say that the appropriation proposed is much less than the exhibit of expenses said to have been incurred. This I believe is the foundation of the application.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only effect of the amendment I have offered is to restore the law to what it was prior to 1861. Prior to that time it was the custom to authorize by law the making of treaties with tribes of Indians where it was deemed necessary. Amendments were offered to the Indian appropriation bills authorizing treaties to be made with the Sioux Indians of the Mississippi or any other tribe, and appropriating a certain sum for the expenses of the negotiation; but of late, under an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill in 1863, it seems that general authority was given to make treaty arrangements with perhaps a great variety of tribes, and there are other provisions of law besides the one which has been referred to on that subject. I think now that the war is over that we ought to fall back on the original practice, and not allow any treaty to be made with the Indian tribes unless the necessity for it be submitted to Congress and an appropriation be made in advance for the purpose of allowing it to be concluded. There will be no practical difficulty in the way of such a course of proceeding. I hope in a year or two to see the whole system of treaties with Indian tribes abolished, but while it stands we ought at least to fall back on the original practice of the Government, which is to allow treaties to be made with Indian tribes only after the necessity for them has been submitted to Congress and an appropriation made for the purpose.

As the law stands, our officers have almost unlimited authority to contract expense under their general power to make treaties with Indian tribes. As a matter of course we cannot restrain this expenditure; we cannot prevent them from bringing a whole tribe to Washington or any other portion of the country, having given them a general authority to make treaties with the Indians.

Mr. HOWE. When did we give any such general authority?

Mr. SHERMAN. One act in 1863 gives the authority, and there are other laws passed in 1861 and in 1862 giving some authority, as I am informed, to make treaties with many of the tribes.

Mr. HOWE. Does the law give the officers authority to spend a dollar in making a treaty?

Mr. SHERMAN. It gives authority to make a treaty, and if a treaty was ever made with Indians without spending money it would be an anomaly. They generally make the Indians drunk in the first place, and it costs something for the whisky, and then we furnish them with tobacco and feed them for a while.

Mr. HOWE. Does the statute direct the President of the United States to make the Indians drunk?

Mr. SHERMAN. The statute authorizes the President to make treaties with the Indians, and any man living in the West ought to know how they are made. But it seems that in one of these cases the Senator from Minnesota congratulates the country over the fact that we have cheated the Indians to the extent of several millions.

Mr. RAMSEY. No; there was no cheating about it; they made the bargain willingly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that when we are treating with Indians who cannot understand our language, who cannot read and write, who are brought here under our influence away from their tribes, particular men selected with whom we treat, it is certainly cheating when we get the advantage of them several million dollars.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator will allow me to say to him that the Chippewas of the Mississippi, of whom I spoke, have among their number men as shrewd at a bargain as any man in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will tell you how we get rid of such men, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] knows it. We bribe them; we call them chiefs; we authorize them to wear feathers, we give them two sections of land, and perhaps $5,000. We provide liberally for the chiefs who make the treaty, we bribe them, and then we get the bulk of the land of the tribe at whatever price we choose to give them. This is somewhat unpleasant to talk about, but I think we ought to go back to the old practice of the Government, which required some showing to be made before an Indian treaty was authorized. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that we ought to abandon the treaty-making system and provide for occupying the Indian lands under the authority of acts of Congress whenever we desire them, making the best arrangement for the benefit of the Indians we can. But, sir, the Senator is greatly mistaken in regard to his idea that Indians are made drunk in order to agree to a treaty. I have been present as a party to several negotiations with Indian tribes, and I never knew of such a thing. I do not believe that in the whole time these Indians have been negotiating with the Government here they have been drunk. I know that the leading men of many of these tribes do not drink at all. It is entirely wrong to undertake here in the Senate to give an impression of that kind to the country. There may have been such instances perhaps in the past history of the Government; but certainly during the last ten or fifteen years it has not occurred. The Indians of many of the tribes are notoriously as temperate as white men; especially their chiefs. When they make these treaties they are as sober as Senators are when they consider them afterward.

Mr. POMEROY. It seems to me to be evident that the Senator from Ohio never made any treaties with Indians if he imagines that they are made drunk in order to effect a treaty. I know an Indian is generally very fond of whisky; but the moment you give him any whisky you cannot make a treaty with him. I have been present when treaties were made, and I have seen efforts made to get them to do business when they had been drinking, and so far as my observation goes when an Indian has been drinking he cannot do anything, but lies perfectly still. You cannot make a treaty with an Indian under those circumstances. He will not treat with you unless he is sober. I have never seen a treaty made when there was any whisky about. I have seen Indians drunk, but I never saw one of them when he was in that state undertake to make a treaty yet. I have been present at the making of a great many treaties, and I never yet saw an Indian who was not sober at the time a treaty was made. I do not believe you could make a treaty with an Indian when he was drunk.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator from Ohio has drawn rather largely on his fancy in describing the manner of negotiating Indian treaties. I do not think the practice is as has been stated; though it is not my purpose to defend either the mode of negotiating treaties or the treaties which have been negotiated. I rise simply to say that I do not understand that there is any authority vested in the President or in the Department by the law to which my attention has been called to contract a dollar of expense.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will perceive that they have done it, and the fact that they have contracted expense is the reason why we are called upon for an appropriation.

Mr. HOWE. I once heard of a justice of the peace who said he knew he could try an action of ejectment because he had just done it; and the Senator's argument is about as conclusive as that of the justice's was in that case. Whether they have contracted expense or not I know not, except as papers are presented here which seem to render bills on behalf of Indian tribes visiting Washington. I do not know what the condition of that is, whether these landlords or these railroad companies really have an account against the United States for their charges for the keep and transportation of these Indians. They have not rendered them to the Government. I apprehend these bills have all been paid. I do not know who paid them; I do not know where the money came from; but I take it they did not come here on the credit of the Government. I take it the railroad companies have got their pay for their transportation; I take it the landlords have got their pay for their entertainment on the way; and so I do not really think any indebtedness has been contracted in the name of the Government; but if it has been, it involves the Government in no obligation any more than if I had contracted it. I might, if I could get credit to do so, import half the State of Wisconsin down here and put the Government under the same obligation to pay the bills as we are under to pay these bills which are said to have been incurred in bringing these Indians here.

So much on the score of obligation. Now, it is a mere question of expediency whether we will pay these expenditures or not. I think the only consideration which calls upon us to pay these bills is the fact stated in the letter read here the other day from the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I forget which, which says he was urged to make these treaties, and he was urged to bring these Indians here by various members of Congress. I do not know but that we may have been committed by these outside representations and efforts of members of Congress to pay these bills. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that no expense ought to be contracted in this way in negotiating these treaties; but I think this amendment goes too far.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to modify it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I feel as the Senator from Wisconsin does, that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio goes too far. If an Indian treaty can be negotiated without expense let them negotiate it and send it here, and we are willing to pass upon it when it comes. The Senator's amendment provides that no treaty shall hereafter be made with any Indian tribe until an appropriation authorizing such treaty shall first be made by law. Perhaps it will not require in some cases a dollar to make a treaty, and if so let them send it. I propose to alter the amendment so as to make it read:

No expense shall hereafter be incurred in negotiating a treaty with any Indian tribe until an appropriation authorizing such expense shall first be made by law.

Mr. HOWE. That amendment will be satisfactory to me; it meets the precise point I was about to raise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri is not now in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to modify my amendment by accepting that amendment. I think it answers the same purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be so modified.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe that this proposition is put upon the ground that it has been the custom to invite Indians to Washington for the purpose of making treaties. I know nothing of that custom; but it seems to me that it is a little premature to make these appropriations before the treaties have been ratified by the Senate. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that none of these treaties have yet been ratified, and it is not yet ascertained that any treaty has really been made between the Government and these Indians. It seems to me that before making an appropriation like this it would be proper to wait until it is ascertained that some treaty has been made. Now, simply to negotiate a treaty between these Indians and the Commissioner does not constitute a binding treaty, for it is necessary that it should be ratified by the Senate; and when it is ratified and is binding upon the contracting parties, then the question will arise, as it seems to me, as to whether or not the expenses of making that treaty should be paid.

I differ with the honorable Senator from Minnesota as to the economy of this mode of making treaties. I understood him to say that these Indians are friendly Indians. When a commission of one or two or three persons are sent to make treaties with friendly tribes is it necessary that a military escort should accompany them at an expense of six or eight or ten thousand dollars? All this work, in my judgment, could have been accomplished by sending to these Indian tribes one or two or three persons for the purpose of making these treaties. Then what assurance have we that the tribes will consider themselves bound by these treaties? A, B, and C, certain Indians, have been invited here, or have come here, representing themselves to be chiefs or heads of bands, and the Commissioner enters into some arrangement with them here in Washington; and of that arrangement the tribe may be entirely ignorant. When the men who have been invited to Washington return home to their respective tribes is it altogether certain that those tribes will recognize their authority to make these treaties, and to enter into binding obligations for them with the Government?

I make these suggestions because it appears to me that we had better hesitate about making this appropriation of $60,000 at this time until we know whether or not we have a treaty with these Indians or any one tribe of them.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is remarkable that the Senator from Oregon, who lives in the midst of an Indian country, should be so ignorant of Indian law as he seems to be. The other day he sat here when we ratified a treaty with the confederated tribes of central Oregon, and he made no such objection as that we should wait until their delegates got home and we saw that the Indians approved of the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where were the Indians who negotiated that treaty when the treaty was made?

Mr. RAMSEY. At home; but what knowledge had you that they would approve the treaty after it went back there? It is a matter of everyday occurrence that the Government, in negotiating with Indian tribes, negotiates with their chiefs; and there is no difficulty in knowing who the chiefs are. But as to the comparative economy of the two modes of treating with Indians I have a word to say. If you send commissioners into the Indian country to treat with a tribe of Indians you must feed the whole body of them. They collect on the occasion and are fed while there. These are the customs of the Indians, and you cannot change them. If you go there to treat with them you must carry provisions enough to feed the whole body while you are negotiating. That is the practice, and you cannot break it up. I say that, in preference to that system, it is economical to bring here the chiefs and head men and negotiate with them here. In this case winter was just approaching, when it was impossible to reach the Indians and carry provisions to feed the tribe while the negotiations were being carried on. Under these circumstances it was advisable to bring their chiefs and head men here. I am now speaking of the case of the Lake Traverse Sioux, where the authorities and people of Minnesota asked the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to make a treaty, and I advised that their chiefs be sent for to come here to negotiate. I gave no such advice in regard to the Indians of Kansas nor the Upper Missouri Sioux nor the Chippewas, though I believe it was wise in all the cases.

Mr. CORBETT. We have had these treaties before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I have had some little knowledge of this matter; and I desire to say that the representatives of these tribes have been brought here to make treaties with the Government under the authority of a law heretofore passed, which law we cannot remedy now. But we may provide against future treaties being made in this way, if we desire to do so. The expenses of these treaties would seem to be large, and it seems to be hardly proper to bring large delegations of Indians here from every tribe with which a treaty is to be made. In some instances I believe as many as twenty-five Indians of one tribe have been brought here for this purpose. I was appointed one of a special committee to call upon the Indian department to ascertain as to the expenses of making these treaties, and to ask them for a detailed statement. We ascertained that there was a much larger number of Indians brought here than we had previously supposed. The committee have not been able at present to decide as to the justice of the treaties; but as Congress was about to adjourn, and it was necessary to provide for this expenditure which had been assumed in bringing these Indians here, we thought it necessary to make this appropriation to meet these expenses; and if we shall hold an executive session hereafter we may confirm the treaties. The Senate will then have an opportunity of examining the treaties more in detail. But as we propose to adjourn, perhaps to-morrow or the day after, it is absolutely necessary to provide for these expenses at once. They seem to have been incurred under the authority of law. The President was authorized by a former law to make treaties, and it is very certain that they could not be made without the expenditure of some money. I am therefore in favor of this appropriation; but I am also in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, that there shall be no treaties hereafter made without the authority of law and an appropriation for the purpose in advance.

Before I sit down, allow me to say a word in regard to the remark of the Senator from Ohio in reference to cheating the Indians. It has been the custom to make treaties with the Indians for the cession of large tracts of land held by them. Those lands, as they are settled, become more valuable. They become valuable by the settlements of the whites, and I see no impropriety in purchasing them from the Indians for a small amount of money. We merely buy from the Indians their possessory right, and then we provide for their care and protection hereafter. That the Government is really entitled to the land I have no doubt, but, still, justice to the Indians and conformity to the previous practice would require the Government to make provision for their welfare and for their civilization as far as possible.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose the treaties with the Indian tribes are not negotiated by virtue of statutes. There may be such statutes in existence, but of course they are only declaratory of the general power possessed by the President of the United States to negotiate treaties, not only with foreign nations, but with Indian tribes. Here is an apparent attempt to deprive him of that power, and to provide that hereafter no treaty shall be negotiated with an Indian tribe unless by some future law such power shall be conferred upon him. I think that this amendment is open to strong exception upon the ground that it attempts to take away from the Executive a power which no one can question. If the system of negotiating Indian treaties be objectionable, the remedy is that the Senate, under its power of assent, shall refuse to concur with the Executive.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that the statutes are declaratory.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then why the necessity of repealing them? I see no reason for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["Oh, no."] I do not see that we can do any other business at present.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope the motion will not be agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope we shall be enabled to dispose of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended to be added to the House amendments.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to move a further amendment as a separate section:

And he further enacted, That the several sums of money heretofore appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, be transferred to and may be expended under the direction of the chief Engineer of the Army, or such officer of the Engineer corps as he may direct.

I will state that at the Treasury Department the law abolishing the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings and transferring its duties to the chief Engineer of the Army is construed not to authorize the transfer of the appropriations of money for purposes which were formerly under the control of the Commissioner, but that the money must still be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. It is also held that as the chief Engineer of the Army is designated in the law particularly, the money must be expended under his direction instead of a subordinate officer, who now has the matter in charge. This amendment is to correct that construction. I have a letter of the Engineer-in-Chief of the Army explaining the matter more fully; but I presume it is not necessary to read it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Oh, no; let us finish this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. On the question of going into executive session I desire to make a remark, as I presume that question is debatable. If the Senate is to adjourn to-morrow or the next day—and so far as the vote of this body may be considered as a determination of that question it seems to have so decided—I submit that there is important business in open session which we ought to proceed with. There is the bill which is now under discussion. There is a bill which is on my table now which is of great and crying importance here in this District, a bill introduced by my colleague and afterward pressed by myself—"a bill providing for a change in the time of electing a mayor and other officers for the city of Washington, District of Columbia." I have seen several gentlemen this very morning very much interested in the District of Columbia, very much interested in Washington, who think that the passage of this bill is of the first importance. The object is to provide for the election of mayor in the coming month of June, so that the freedmen, who now for the first time have the elective franchise, may help to determine who is to be mayor of Washington.

That is one of the measures before you. There is then another measure which I have introduced myself, and my colleague has also introduced a kindred measure; I refer to Senate bill No. 115, entitled "A bill to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government, by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens." Now, there is not a newspaper that does not bring us something from Maryland, from Delaware, even from Ohio showing the importance of Congress interfering to cut this gordian knot of the suffrage question. Unquestionably, under the Constitution, both in its original provisions and its two amendments, Congress has ample power over the whole question. There can be no doubt about it. We have already exercised the power in conferring civil rights. Why should we hesitate to exercise the same power in conferring political rights?

I allude to this simply as a reason why we should proceed with the business on your table in open session rather than go into executive session. That business may be taken up afterward at a called session of the Senate. I presume from what I hear that there must be a called session of the Senate when the legislative session of Congress terminates, if it shall terminate as abruptly as seemed to be contemplated yesterday. Therefore, I would suggest that all the executive business be postponed, and let us proceed with this important legislative business, which I submit is so essential to the best interests of the country. The people in Maryland, if I may trust what I hear from there both by letter and by the communications of gentlemen who were here yesterday—especially our late valued associate on this floor, Mr. Creswell, whom I name, because he is no longer one of our number—the people of Maryland are anxious for some action on our part that shall relieve them from their terrible distress. They are now standing face to face with the spirit of the rebellion, and they need your assistance. Under these circumstances I hope that the Senate will proceed with the business on your table and postpone all nominations of executive business to a later day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope we shall be allowed to pass the bill before the Senate. This debate has taken more time, I am sure, than would have been sufficient to dispose of the bill. It will not occupy more than five or ten minutes—no more.

Mr. WILSON. As the Senate seems now to be in a condition to proceed with business I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to offer the following amendment:

For the repair of the Long bridge, District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $15,000.

I send to the desk to be read a letter in explanation of the necessity of this appropriation.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS, GROUNDS, AND WORKS, CAPITOL OF THE UNITED STATES, March 25, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report on the condition of the "Long bridge" across the Potomac, and respectfully request that an appropriation be made before the adjournment of the present session of Congress for repairing and placing it in such order that travel may be resumed with the least practicable delay. Upon a personal examination I find that five spans, of sixty-two feet each, have been carried away by the heavy accumulation of ice during the last winter, most of the trestle work having been damaged and the piles cut off. A large quantity of the timber has been saved and securely fastened to the bridge, almost sufficient to repair it. With the exception of these spans the roadway is in good repair. The draws are in good working order, one of them being almost perfectly new. An appropriation of $15,000 will place it in good traveling condition, and, without some unforeseen accident, will render it sufficiently so until the subject of a new bridge has been considered and decided upon. The necessity for the immediate repairs is imperative. Say by ferry no direct communication can be had between both shores of the Potomac, except by what is known as the Chain bridge, the railroad and Aqueduct bridges not being available for wagon transportation. This makes a long, difficult, and tedious road to travel for the inhabitants of Alexandria county and portions of Fairfax having business relations with the capital. The United States Government, as well as the general public, are greatly inconvenienced. Almost the entire produce of these two counties is entirely cut off from Washington, thereby creating an advance on all kinds of market produce in the city, as well as depriving the citizens of those localities of many useful supplies only to be obtained in this market. Some five hundred vehicles daily pass over the bridge. I most respectfully and urgently call the attention of your honorable committee to the above facts, and request that the necessary appropriation be made.

I am, sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,

N. MICHLER,

Major of Engineers, Brevet Brigadier General, United States Army, in charge.

Hon. JAMES HARRIAN, Chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CORBETT. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to offer the following amendment, and I send to the desk a letter in explanation of it:

For the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home in the District of Columbia, organized under the act of the 25th of July, 1866, amended by the act of the 22d of February, 1867, to be expended under the direction of the officers of said institution, $5,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise a question of order under that amendment, under the recent rule of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe there is a rule recently adopted, that amendments to appropriation bills must be presented to the Committee on Appropriations beforehand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise that question, that the Committee on Appropriations had no notice of the intention to move this amendment.

Mr. CORBETT. Can it not be done by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On looking at the rules the Chair finds that the recent amendment to the rule applies to general appropriation bills. The Chair hardly knows whether to hold that this bill comes within that class. It seems to be an appropriation bill for a special purpose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is general in its character; it is a deficiency bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the bill was not a general appropriation bill it would not have come from the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it be so regarded the amendment is out of order, and so are all the rest of them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No. In all the other instances the Committee on Appropriations had notice. They had been sent to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first impression of the Chair was that this rule only applied to the general appropriation bills to carry on the various Departments of the Government; but on reflection he does not see that a distinction can very well be drawn. This is an appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The general understanding, I think, under the new rule, and I am quite sure that was its spirit and meaning, is that any committee desiring to move an amendment upon an appropriation bill must give one day's notice to the Committee on Appropriations of its intention so to do, in order to apprise that committee of its purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On reflection, the Chair is inclined to think that it is the safest course, in giving a construction to this new rule, to hold that all appropriation bills coming from the Committee on Appropriations are subject to the provision of the rule requiring notice to be given of amendments intended to be offered. This amendment is therefore ruled out of order. ["Question."] There is no further question unless some amendment be moved. The House amendments have all been acted upon.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 63) placing the solicitor and assistant solicitor of the Court of Claims in the department of the Attorney General, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the House resolution relative to the adjournment of Congress, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 96) to establish a port of delivery at Chester, Pennsylvania, and the bill (S. No. 112) to incorporate the Lincoln Monument Association.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) concerning the payment of claims made by foreign Governments against the United States for property destroyed by the armies of the United States;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) respecting the proposed confederation of Provinces on the northern frontier of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 63) to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, for military purposes;

A bill (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force in the Patent Office;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 21) relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Moore, his Secretary, announced that he had this day approved and signed the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 38) in relation to the acknowledgment of deeds in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 77) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 21, 1866;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) to make valid the laws of New Mexico passed at the session of the Legislature held at Santa Fé from the 3d day of December, 1866, to the 31st day of January, 1867;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department of the United States of America; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) concerning the uniform of persons in the diplomatic service of the United States.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SENATORS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what I suppose is a privileged question. I wish to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary with regard to certain testimony referred to that committee, which testimony it was alleged affected members of this body. The committee have had that matter under consideration, and have instructed me to make a report in writing, which I send to the desk, together with the papers. I ask that the report be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, transmitting certain testimony, which testimony, as stated in the resolution, "apparently affects one or more members of the Senate," beg leave to report:

That the testimony transmitted was taken in the investigation of a subject wholly disconnected from the Senate or any of its members, and the allusions it contains to Senators are only incidental to the investigation of the main subject, are mostly hearsay, and altogether of an inconclusive character, so far as they relate to Hon. JAMES R. DOOLITTLE and Hon. DAVID T. PATTERSON, the Senators alluded to.

Your committee have, however, resorted to the original sources of information on the subject, and have examined witnesses on oath whose position was such that they must have known of any arrangement or understanding by which the Senators alluded to, or either of them, were to be benefited by the confirmation of Mr. Smythe as the collector of the port of New York, or in any manner to be sharers in the general order, or any other business connected with the New York custom-house, and the testimony fails to show any such understanding or interest.

However the names of Messrs. DOOLITTLE and PATTERSON may have been used by third parties in speaking of the general-order business, or whatever may have been the intention of Mr. Smythe, the collector, in regard to it, there is no evidence to show that either of those Senators gave any sanction to or had any knowledge of such use of their names or such intention.

Your committee are fully satisfied, from an examination of the testimony referred, the statements of the Senators themselves, and the additional testimony they have taken, that there is no ground for believing that either of the Senators named has acted dishonorably or corruptly in regard to any matter to which the testimony referred relates, and that there is nothing in said testimony affecting either of said Senators requiring further investigation. They therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. As a member of the Judiciary Committee I did not agree to this report, but reserved the right to state my views in the form of a minority report, which I have prepared hastily here at my desk; and if there be no objection I will read it myself, instead of sending it to the Clerk, as it may not be very legible to him.

The testimony referred to the Committee on the Judiciary discloses repeated instances in which Mr. Smythe, the collector of the port of New York, declared an intention on his part to dispose of the general-order business so as to derive large sums of money from it, and to divide this money among other persons, two of whom, as indicated by him, were the members of the Senate named in the report of a majority of the committee, or one of said members and the son of the other.

These declarations seem to have been made from time to time after Mr. Smythe became collector, and as late as October, 1866. They in some instances implied an arrangement with other persons, as well as an intention on the part of Mr. Smythe himself.

Mr. Smythe, in testifying before the committee, denied that such an arrangement as to a division of the moneys had been made with others, and stated that it was only an intention of his own. He testified that this intention was never communicated to either of the Senators referred to, and that nothing was ever paid to either of them.

The Senators themselves, in communications to the committee, also denied all privity with the intention of Mr. Smythe to make them sharers in the general-order business.

No testimony was produced to the committee showing that there was knowledge or consent on the part of the two Senators referred to or of either of them.

Upon this state of facts the member of the committee who submits these views thinks the Senators in question should be exonerated from the imputations which have been cast upon them.

In conclusion, the undersigned refers to the testimony taken by the committee and to the communications made to it, in the hope that the same may be printed.

ROSCOE CONKLING.

I understand that the chairman of the committee submits no motion to print this testimony. If no other member of the Senate shall make that motion, I desire to submit such a motion myself. By the testimony I mean the sworn testimony taken by the Committee on the Judiciary, and also the communications not under oath made by these gentlemen. It is not bulky, and I think there is no reason by way of convenience or otherwise why it should not be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the question is at this time on agreeing to the report of the committee, and the motion which the Senator from New York indicates cannot be made at this stage of the proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print is not now in order, but it will be very soon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agreed to the conclusions of the committee and to the form of this report; taking the whole evidence together, I think there is nothing which justifies any accusation against either of these gentlemen; but I thought it due to them and to the country and to the Senate and to the House of Representatives that the testimony taken before us should be printed, as well as that which has been already taken by the House of Representatives, and which has been printed and published; and my only objection to making the report in the form in which it is made was and is now merely that there ought to have been added to this request to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject a motion coming from the committee that this testimony be printed. In justice to these gentlemen, and in justice to the Senate, I think it should be done, and I hope, therefore, that when the proper period comes that motion will be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not understand that there is any report from the minority of the committee in conflict at all with the conclusions to which the majority of the committee have come. If I heard aright that part of the statement made by the honorable member from New York, it was not at all intended to reflect upon the character of these two Senators. I understood him as concurring with the rest of the committee; I believe we were unanimous that there was nothing before us (although we had exhausted all the proper sources of information upon the subject) in any manner affecting injuriously the two gentlemen whose names appeared in the evidence. I trust, therefore, that, although there is apparently a minority report, it will not be understood that there was any difference of opinion among the members of the committee upon the subject which was immediately before us; that is to say, upon the question whether the two Senators had acted improperly or not. That they had not, as far as any evidence before us was concerned, although we had exhausted all the evidence we thought could be obtained for the purpose of enlightening us on the subject, was, I believe, the unanimous opinion of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report discharging the committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, I move that the testimony taken by the committee be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senate, if I can get its attention for a moment, what this question is, and why I did not think it proper, as one member of the committee in making the report, which I suppose will be published as a matter of course, coming from a committee, to also move to print the testimony. The testimony submitted to the committee consisted of a printed volume of three hundred and fifty pages. In those three hundred and fifty pages there are thirty-two allusions to the Senators supposed to be affected by the testimony. This is a large volume. It has already been printed by the House of Representatives. This testimony was supposed by the House, in transmitting it, to affect certain members of this body; and it was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary with the additional testimony of one witness in manuscript. The committee, as is stated in their report, brought before them witnesses, and their testimony is necessarily of a negative character. There is nothing in the testimony of any one of the witnesses brought before the committee to show anything whatever improper on the part of these Senators. So far from it, the testimony removes any suspicion that might be drawn from this printed volume.

Now, it is proposed to print what? If you print anything you must reprint the whole of this book, because you have to search through this book by reference to thirty-two different portions of the three hundred and fifty pages for the allusions which have been made, and which it was supposed reflected upon certain Senators. Then you have to compare that with the testimony submitted to the Judiciary Committee, and you have to take the statements of the Senators made themselves in this body. They were before the committee. We had official notice of the declarations made by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Tennessee on this floor. They referred us to those statements. Now, if you are going to publish a book, if you are not satisfied with the conclusion to which the committee has come that has examined all these statements, then publish this book and send it out to the country; but who will ever read it? There is no disposition to hide anything, to secrete anything. These are public documents.

Mr. WILSON. Was not Smythe before your committee?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; and we had him sworn as to this matter. We went into no investigation about custom-house affairs in New York any further than they related to members of this body. We confined our examination to that point. That was the only question submitted to us. The Senator from Massachusetts, if he is paying attention, will recollect that the testimony which comes out in regard to Senators here is only incidental. The House of Representatives had a committee investigating the doings of the custom-house in the city of New York. That was their primary object, hunting up matters there. In that investigation incidentally allusions were made to members of this body, which they thought proper to send to us. They did not follow up that investigation in regard to members of this body. It was not the matter they were investigating. They sent it to us and we take that up. We necessarily have to refer to this book, in which there are thirty-two different pages which it was supposed might have some bearing on Senators incidentally.

The committee have examined those. They then have brought before them the men who must know if there is any truth in these suspicions. We have had Smythe himself before us. We have had the man who, if there is anything of it, must know it, and have either committed perjury or else there was nothing of it. We have examined him. The testimony is negative. There is no direct charge in this volume, but there are inferences or suspicions perhaps sufficient to justify an inquiry. Now, I thought it would be injudicious to republish all this book again and all this testimony. If anybody wishes to see it the printed volume is on your table and on the table of every member, and the other testimony is with the Secretary, and anybody can examine it who wishes to do so. It is of a negative character, of course. I submit that it would be unjust to publish a part of it, and I did not think there was any occasion to republish the whole of it. The committee having examined it, and having come to the conclusion which the Senate has adopted, if you have any confidence in the judgment of the committee that the testimony shows nothing against these gentlemen, there is no object in republishing this volume. That is all I have to say. If the Senate think proper to publish it, do so.

Mr. CONKLING. Whenever the Senator from Illinois makes up his mind to do anything we all know that he is able to give reasons plausible at least for the action which he proposes to take; and yet I submit to him that his remarks to the Senate illustrate rather his own ingenuity than any objection there is to this motion. Who proposes to republish the volume which has already been published by the House of Representatives and laid upon our table? Who can propose rationally to do any such thing? It has been printed, printed by the Public Printer; it comes here as a public document; and what member of this body proposes, or what suggestion of anybody else would lead to; the idea that we must republish that book? Certainly, I make no such motion, and I promise the Senator from Illinois that I will make no such motion. Who can propose that the speeches delivered by these Senators here on the floor, and published in the Globe, and never even referred to this committee, shall be published with this report? Certainly I have made no such motion, and I shall not make it. My motion is simply that that testimony, brief, which can be cheaply published, and which the public will want to see, which was taken by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in a very short space of time, shall not be pigeon-holed and put away where any one can suppose that the committee or anybody else wants to conceal it; but that this book, having been laid upon the tables and published to the world, the speeches delivered in the Senate having been published to the world, this testimony also, small as it is in bulk, and cheaply as it will be printed, may not constitute an exception to the rule, may not be kept secret, but that that also may be laid upon the tables of Senators and be open to the eye of the public if they see fit to look at it.

One of these gentlemen presented to the committee a written communication. Mr. Smythe presented a written communication; another person, or more than one, presented a written communication. And then the committee briefly examined on oath Mr. Smythe and one other person. Now, as one member of this committee, whether I look to doing justice to these two Senators, or whether I look to justice being done to any other person connected with this matter, or justice being done to myself as a member of the committee, I want the Senate to see and I want the public to know precisely what we had before us upon which we affirm, as we all do, that these Senators deserve to be exonerated. The Senator from Illinois says that this testimony is negative, that it shows that they are guiltless and stainless. Is it not due to them for that reason that the Senate and the world should see it? Why hide it under a bushel, or let it smolder in a pigeon-hole? Among the ethics of the Romans was a maxim as to morality, that we should not only be, but we should seem; that a thing should be done not only right in fact, but right in appearance. So I think; and therefore I should like to have everybody know in regard to this matter precisely what took place in the committee-room as far as it is matter of record; and I should like it for this reason: it is idle to deny that this matter of the custom-house in the city of New York, whether it extends to many persons or only to a few, is one upon which the public, the commercial public and the general public, look with great interest and with great concern. They believe that a very unwholesome state of things exists in the administration of that office, and has existed for a long time. It appears in this printed volume that the present collector of that port proposed to sell, to give, to dispose of in some way upon his own favor the general-order business, and to receive for that business a sum variously stated, sometimes as $40,000, and once or twice as $50,000. It appears that the only three surviving ex-collectors, Mr. Barney, Mr. Redfield, and Mr. Schell, appeared before that committee and stated that such a proposition, such an act was, as far as they understood, unknown in the experience of the custom-house. It appears that this money to be thus acquired in an unprecedented way, to say the least of it, was to be divided upon the favor of the collector among various friends of his.

Now, sir, that transaction is an unwholesome, an illicit, and improper one, deserving, in my judgment, the brand which enlightened public judgment will be certain to place upon it. There is enough, therefore, in this transaction to teach us that the public will scrutinize it; and the sole motive that I have in asking that this brief testimony may be published is that the public may understand as to the Senate, as to its committee, and as to the humblest member of its committee, that nothing was done which ought not to have been done; but that without going at all into the general question of what had been done at the port of New York, the committee, upon the evidence before it on one single point, namely, that evidence as it affected two members of this body, found that an acquittal, an exoneration was due to them as the result of that evidence. It can do nobody injustice; but I submit that great injustice might be done, and that great harm might come, from any action which would look as if, from any motive whatever, there was a disposition anywhere to withhold from the public what I think the public is entitled to know.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If any illustration were wanted of the impropriety of the Senator's motion, it would be found in his speech. In commenting upon this question in regard to testimony affecting members of this body the Senator has gone into a speech in reference to the conduct of the New York custom-house, and what three former collectors have testified to as to their practice, and as to $40,000 or $50,000 having been offered. Now, I do not propose to mix up the Senators in this body with any such transactions in New York [Mr. CONKLING. Nor I] about which they know nothing, and with which they had nothing to do, and with which the testimony shows they had nothing to do, and with which we have reported that they had nothing to do. The Senator makes a speech on that subject, and talks about hiding from the public. Why, sir, are the documents laid on your table in open Senate hid away from the public? Will not every reporter in your galleries make copies of them if he desires to do so? Nobody has any intention of hiding them.

But now what is the Senator's motion? His motion is to publish a part of the testimony before the Committee on the Judiciary. His motion is that, and nothing else.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all. All that has been referred to the committee and published already, I do not propose to republish; but I do propose to complete the publication of the testimony by publishing that which has not yet been published. That is all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How will that be published? You get up a publication of twenty pages, giving a part of the case, and the rest of it is in a volume of three hundred and fifty pages. Will that show the case to the public? You must wade through the volume relating to New York frauds. That was all referred to this committee the whole of it was before us; and in that book there are thirty-two references upon thirty-two different pages to this matter. Now you propose to publish a part, to have a partial statement go out. If anything is to be published, publish it all. I have no objection to its being published if the Senate think proper to publish it. There is no necessity for publishing it, but if it is to be published, publish the whole of it, and all about it, and all the statements, and I apprehend the public eye, which the Senator from New York talks about, will never peruse it. So far as it is connected with these gentlemen, the committee have examined all this mass of testimony and have taken some evidence themselves, and have arrived at a conclusion which has been approved by the Senate. The report, as a matter of course, will be published, and anybody that wants to see the grounds upon which the report is based may go and examine these voluminous papers and ascertain the basis of the report if he desires to do so.

Now, sir, I wish to take up no time about this matter. If the Senate wish to make the publication I have no objection, but the committee did not think it necessary to make such a recommendation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to remind my friend from Illinois that the report itself, if I correctly understand the rules of the Senate, cannot be printed without an order. It has been the constant practice whenever a report is made, if it is desired that it should be printed, that there should be a motion and an order made. It requires, therefore, the action of the Senate to print the very report that my friend from Illinois has submitted. Now, then, the simple question is whether, in addition to printing that report, provided we should order its printing, the evidence upon which that report is based, the additional evidence which has not already been printed by order of one House, should be printed, or whether it should be laid away in the files of the Senate for anybody to get at who might take an interest in it. That question arose in committee, as has been well understood from what has been said, and I voted against making the report at all, not upon the ground that there was anything to justify the charges against the gentleman accused, but upon the ground that the majority of the committee decided that they would not recommend that the evidence be printed. I thought, to say nothing of the innate impropriety of such a proceeding as that, that everybody who was disposed to find fault, everybody who was disposed to accuse these gentlemen, everybody, therefore, who was disposed to reflect upon the conduct of the Senate or any of its members, could say with great plausibility, if not with justice, that we were undertaking to suppress and to cover up the evidence upon which we based our conclusions, when, if it were spread before the world, the world would see that we had made a mistake, and that the evidence did not justify the report we had spread upon the records of the Senate.

Now, I beg the Senate to understand that the testimony which was sent to us by the House of Representatives, and which was referred to this committee, has been all published by authority, and it is a useless waste of public money to reprint it, because you would only reprint it in the same types you have used once before and have exactly the same thing; but my friend from Illinois says, how is anybody to know what the truth is from this evidence; he has got to look into two volumes to get it all. That is to say a man has to take one bundle which contains this testimony, and another which contains the report and the additional testimony. My friend is old enough lawyer to know that he cannot settle any law question without looking into more than one volume, and yet he has settled a great many. It will be no hardship to the inquirer after truth, to the people of this country, who are as much concerned as we are in the purity of the conduct of every member of the Senate, and in the duty of the Senate to preserve its dignity and its decorum—it will be no great hardship to print at the public expense the testimony of two or three witnesses who testified affirmatively to matters within their knowledge and not to hearsay, and the statements taken upon honor from these Senators, according to the practice of the Senate, as to their knowledge of the affair. It does seem to me that the simplest dictates of justice and decency and fair play require that, inasmuch as these innuendoes and insinuations and suspicions and accusations have already been published by the authority of Congress, the full and complete denial and justification of the conduct of these gentlemen should be printed also. Let our report, therefore, be fortified by this testimony rather than exposed to the insinuation and the criticism that we have undertaken to whitewash and cover up something which the testimony did not authorize us to do.

Mr. DIXON. In relation to this question, whether the testimony now submitted or any part of it shall be ordered to be printed by the Senate, I have no wish, nor have I on that point a word to say. That is to me a matter wholly indifferent. For my own part, however, I see nothing which can be called testimony to print. What has the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom this matter was referred, told us? He informs us that there was not a single word of evidence, not an iota, not the slightest approach to a particle of testimony to show that either of the Senators in question had been guilty of the charge brought against them. I go further, and say that before the House committee there not only was no testimony against either of them, but all the testimony was that they were not guilty; that they had received nothing, that they never had heard of a proposition that they should receive anything. I go further still, and say that before the committee of the House of Representatives, according to their own report laid upon our table, all the evidence was actually affirmative of their entire innocence. It positively declared by the united voice of every witness that they had received nothing, that nothing had ever been proposed to be given to them, that they never had, on any occasion, the subject brought to their attention.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me that this whole proceeding is the most extraordinary that has ever been brought before a deliberative body. We, as Senators, suppose when we come into this Chamber, that if we walk honestly, if we keep our Senatorial robes unspotted, we are safe. It seems that this is no longer the case. If a thought happens to flit through the mind of some individual outside of this body that at some time or other he will offer or propose to pay to a Senator a sum of money as a reward for some benefaction which he may suppose himself to have received, then it seems the Senator as to whom he may happen to entertain such an idea is liable to be charged with a heinous offense, to be placed upon his defense, and to be considered guilty until he proves himself innocent.

Sir, this is no light and trifling thing. I do not claim that the feelings of a Senator are more sensitive than those of other men. But what is the position in which a man of honor may be placed, keenly sensitive to any stain upon his honor, held up before the country, as in this instance, for a period of six weeks, charged in the newspapers with having received a bribe, and he sitting here compelled to endure all the tortures that an honorable man would suffer under that imputation? And yet the Senator who sits behind me, who is now absent, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] because he indignantly before this body denied the imputation and charged home upon the assailant, has himself been subjected, here and elsewhere, to reproach for so doing, and because his spirit did flame up in indignation, as yours, sir, would, and as mine would under the same circumstances, he has been denounced as an assailant and an aggressor.

I know, sir, how improper it would be for me to comment with severity at this time upon a proceeding of the House of Representatives or upon the conduct of a member of a committee of the House of Representatives, and I do not intend to do so; but still I can scarcely forbear from saying what is signally noticeable here, that this committee of the House of Representatives never had before them the slightest testimony to impugn the character of either of these Senators. They must have known that there was no guilt on the part of either of them if they were capable of forming an opinion upon the testimony before them.

Sir, it is a difficult matter to speak of this case within the prescribed rules of order. To say that this committee did not know, with all the evidence before them, that these Senators were wholly innocent is to impugn their competency and intelligence and deny them the possession of common sense. To say, on the other hand, that they knew them to be innocent would be to attack their integrity, and to deny them the possession of common honesty. Such is the dilemma in which they have placed themselves. I think, however, I have a right in the absence of my friend to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the great fact that he has been compelled to stand up here in self-defence, without the slightest scintilla of evidence against him, and without even a formal accusation. He is now absent. The other Senator is present, and in his presence I will not speak of him; but I may say of my absent friend what I think every Senator will agree with me in saying, that if there is a man in this body blameless in his habitual conduct, pure, white, unspotted in his character, it is JAMES R. DOOLITTLE. You, sir, and others differ from him politically, but I think there is no Senator who has served with him in this body who will not bear testimony that I speak but the exact truth when I speak thus of him.

Sir, this is not an ordinary case of an accusation unsupported—a charge unproved. It is the case of an honorable, incorruptible man, subjected not only without a witness against him, but without an accuser, to a vague, shadowy, undefined suspicion. I rejoice that the Judiciary Committee have had an opportunity to exhibit it in its true light, and to show that there not only is no evidence of guilt, but that there is not presented even a charge of misconduct or an accusation of impropriety.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this is not a question of politics, of policy, or even of economy. It is simply a question of justice. The evidence affecting these Senators has been published by the House of Representatives; let the evidence exonerating them taken by the Senate committee be published by the Senate; and then putting the two volumes together the country will have the whole case. It is true, the committee made a report exonerating these Senators; but all the evidence published is evidence on the other side. Let the evidence sustaining this report be published, and it cannot be said that it is a whitewashing affair.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I wish, if this testimony is to be printed, that the testimony of the man Hull, read here the other day, shall be printed with it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The testimony which has been taken before the Committee on the Judiciary all relates to the exculpation of the two Senators. It would be great injustice to them, and great injustice to the committee, to have that only published, for the public mind would at once say, "This is very well for one side of it; but where is the other side to which this testimony is in answer and which it rebuts?" Therefore it is a necessity, if the testimony which was taken before the Judiciary Committee is to be published, that the other be published. It is unnecessary to say that that is already printed, for to all intents and purposes it is not printed unless it is printed in connection with the report and with the testimony which we have taken. If the Senate see proper to print all together that is fair; but to print part of it, and to refer the public to the archives to hunt up the testimony which that rebuts, is injustice.

Mr. BUCKALEW. When this subject was before the Senate on a former occasion I was in favor of the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, that the communication which came from the House of Representatives should be respectfully returned to that body; and I was in favor of it for the reason that upon the very face of the matter which they communicated to us it did not appear that there was reasonable cause for prosecuting any inquiry. Now, sir, for the same reason which then operated on my mind in favor of the motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri, I am opposed to the printing of the testimony taken by the House of Representatives or by its committee. Upon the very face of that testimony it appeared that there was no occasion, that there was no sufficient cause, in my judgment, for instituting an inquiry upon this subject. So far as I observe and understand, there was no legal testimony whatever taken by that committee; I mean testimony which would be admitted in a court of justice anywhere in this country under Federal or State authority. It was but a mass of hearsay, of indirect, illegal information in a judicial point of view, which was wholly undeserving of the attention of either House of Congress; and I hold that the committee of the House made a grave error in accepting such testimony from any witness called before them. They ought to have proceeded upon those rules for the investigation of questions of fact which obtain everywhere in judicial tribunals, and which are necessary, which are indispensable for the ascertainment of truth and for the furtherance of the ends of justice.

Now, sir, I think we have dignified this hearsay, this illegal, this improper evidence taken by the House committee too much already by referring the subject to a committee of this body. I am willing that the report which that committee has made shall go to the country. I suppose it will be accepted by the country as satisfactory and as a final disposition of the subject. I for one, however, will not give dignity and importance to a mass of irrelevant and illegal testimony which has been taken in secret and ex parte by a committee of the House, by the sanction of a vote of this Senate, and I will not say by a vote of this Senate that it is important, that it is consequential enough to be obtruded upon the reading community, and to be pondered upon and studied by the reading community throughout the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, to print the evidence taken by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the Senator from Tennessee suggested the testimony of Mr. Hull with it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir; I want the testimony of Hull printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I include that in my motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the motion by printing all the testimony before the committee relating in any way to the Senators referred to. Let it all go together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a mere useless expense, I submit, to print over again from the same type and in the same way and lay on the table a second time this volume of evidence. My motion is to print simply the brief evidence taken by the Judiciary Committee, including of course the unsworn statements of these gentlemen themselves, and I modified my motion, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, so as to include the testimony of Hull, which he wishes to have printed. That is all;

but I object entirely to reprinting all this testimony.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is so manifestly improper to put out a publication of this partial character that I trust the Senate will not publish it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The House have done it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think the example of the House is to be commended in that respect. Both the Senators made statements here. Those statements were made by them in their place. They came before the Judiciary Committee, and their statements made in this body were there referred to as their statements. It is improper to publish this without publishing those statements. We relied upon those statements in making up our report, and said that from the statements of the Senators and the other testimony we came to a certain conclusion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Those statements were made before us also.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at length. The Senator from Tennessee referred to the statement he made in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And said it was true.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And said it was true; but he did not repeat the statement there. The Senator from Wisconsin also made a lengthy statement. Now, these statements ought to go out with the rest of the testimony if it goes at all.

Again, it seems strange to me to say that because in a volume of three hundred and fifty pages there is certain testimony relating to these Senators which has been published by the House of Representatives, therefore the public understand it and can find it when you put out a little document here containing simply the sworn testimony of two or three witnesses. You might as well hide it, as the Senator from New York said, in a pigeon-hole. It is more effectually hid in this large document published by the House. You must either select out the thirty-two pages of that document which refer in any way, however remote or indirect—and it was very remotely and indirectly as I think—to the Senators alluded to, and publish these thirty-two pages, or you must publish the whole of it.

Mr. HOWARD. Why not make the selection?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would take some time, and would be a very tedious task. The Senator from New York proposes simply to publish what was sworn to before the Committee on the Judiciary, including the statements made before the committee by the two Senators. One of them made no statement except to refer to what he said in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the same thing as if he had repeated it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then who will know what his statement is when that is published?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Secretary who has these things printed will.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If you are going to make a publication at all—and that I do not object to if the Senate think it proper—publish all that has been said with reference to the matter, whether it is in the printed document or whether it is anywhere else.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to recapitulate what I have said before; but it does seem to me the Senate had better leave its executive business until after the close of the legislative session. There is important business on the table. There is this very question, which ought not to be brushed aside in this way, but ought to be acted upon definitely. Then there are four or five important bills that the Senate ought to act upon, and I do submit that it would be better for us to proceed with the consideration of the legislative business, and leave the executive business to be disposed of afterward in an executive session.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is evidently no hope of doing anything in open session, and I desire to go into executive session, where we possibly can do something.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 53) relating to the transportation of troops by the Isthmus route to the Pacific States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose there will be no objection on the part of anybody to printing the report of the Judiciary Committee which was made just now. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] tells me that a motion is necessary for that purpose. I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Including the minority report also?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly. I make a motion to print the report, with the views of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion may be entertained by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were then closed; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 27, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LINCOLN MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. ORTH. I ask that by unanimous consent Senate bill No. 112, to incorporate the Lincoln Monument Association, be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at the present time.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

By the bill, which was read at length, Alexander W. Randall, James Harlan, Alexander Ramsey, Nathaniel P. Banks, Sidney Perham, John Conness, John T. Wilson, Godlove S. Orth, Delos R. Ashley, Halbert E. Paine, Charles O'Neill, Burt Van Horn, John F. Driggs, Frederick E. Woodbridge, Jacob Benton, John Hill, Shelby M. Cullom, Thomas A. Jenckes, Orin S. Ferry, N. B. Smithers, Francis Thomas, Samuel McKee, Horace Maynard, John F. Benjamin, Rufus Mallory, Sidney Clarke, Daniel Polsley, Walter A. Burleigh, John Taffe, and their successors, are constituted a body-corporate in the District of Columbia by the name of the Lincoln Monument Association, for the purpose of erecting a monument in the city of Washington commemorative of the great charter of emancipation and universal liberty in America.

It is provided in the second section that the persons named in the first section of this act shall be the first trustees of the corporation, and shall have power to fill vacancies in their number, and to add to their number, not exceeding one from each State in the Union.

By the third, fourth, and fifth sections the corporation is empowered to own and control such property as may be necessary for the carrying out of the objects of the association; to collect money, and to make such rules and regulations as they may deem necessary or expedient; to appoint a president, a vice president, a secretary, a treasurer, and also a board of managers, consisting of not less than seven, nor more than thirteen, who are to have a general control of the affairs of the association, and who may be selected from persons not included in the list of corporators.

The sixth section provides that the property of the corporation held or occupied by them for the uses and purposes of their corporation shall be exempt from all taxes to be levied under the authority of the United States or of any municipal corporation within the District of Columbia.

The seventh section reserves to Congress the right at any time hereafter to repeal, alter, or amend this act.

Mr. ORTH called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION TOUR TO PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. McCLURG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the report of the tour of inspection made by General M. D. L. Simpson, of the commissary department, to the Pacific coast, during the summer and fall of 1866.

Mr. McCLURG moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS DAINESE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution proposing the appointment of a select committee; and I will state in advance that I do not wish to be a member of this committee. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of three members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into the matter and things charged in the memorial of Francis Dainese, which accompanies this resolution, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report the facts with such action as said committee may recommend to this House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

SURVEY OF ROCK RIVER.

Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to send the report of Brevet Brigadier General J. H. Wilson, upon the survey and examination of the Rock river, if not sent to the House prior to its adjournment, to the Congressional Printer, and that the same be printed with maps.

Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report and maps of General Wilson upon the survey and examination of the Rock river, when presented, three thousand extra copies for the use of the House, and five hundred copies for the use of the Bureau of Engineers.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 63) to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, for military purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service.

SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to reappoint the select Committee on Southern Railroads to whom shall be referred the evidence taken by said committee during the Thirty-Ninth Congress, with power to sit during the recess, and to send for persons and papers, and to report during the next session of Congress, and the Speaker to fill any vacancies that there may be on said committee.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to say it is the memorial of a large house in New York, and is for the purpose of trying to arrange affairs with the Government. The Government took possession of the railroad with the rolling stock, and this is necessary that the road may be completed.

Mr. CHANLER. Having been on the minority of the committee, and knowing that the business has not been so far developed in the absence of the chairman, Mr. MAYNARD, of Tennessee, as to render it necessary for the reassembling of the committee, I must persist in my objection. I speak with the understanding that in the report of the committee no request is made to report progress, and it was the understanding that there should be no action taken until Congress reassembled. There was no business before the committee calling for action; and nothing whatever, so far as I understand, to jeopardize the rights of any one.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is necessary, that the matter be arranged, this committee should be reappointed. I have done this at the request of the owners of the road.

Mr. CHANLER. If this were for the protection of interests I should not object, but I do not so understand.

Mr. SPALDING. It will save money to the Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to lay before the House certain papers which he received a few days ago. The Clerk will read the accompanying letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE TENNESSEE, QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES MILITARY ROADS, LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, March 19, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, as directed, my evidence before your committee, with accompanying documents.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. R. HAMELL.

Brevet Major, Acting Quartermaster in charge of United States Military Railroads.

To the honorable Chairman select Committee on Southern Railroads, House of Representatives, Washington, District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. These papers have been in the possession of the Speaker for several days, as there was no committee in legal existence to which they could be referred.

Mr. CHANLER. As a member of that committee nothing has been developed, I am sure, which can call for the reappointment of this committee at this time. I think there is no necessity for the reappointment of the committee. There are others here who were members of the committee. If I thought it were necessary I would not object.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Is it not a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The appointment of a standing committee is of a privileged character, but in reference to the appointment of a special committee the Chair would have to ask the consent of the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move, then, to suspend the rules so I may introduce the resolution, and that the testimony presented by the Chair may be referred to the committee when appointed.

Mr. CHANLER. We have had the testimony before us.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 20.

Mr. CHANLER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CHANLER and Mr. McCLURG were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 23.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, demanded the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table:

The latter motion was agreed to.

The evidence presented by the Speaker was also ordered to be referred to the committee when appointed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. McCARTHY.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force in the Patent Office; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 21) relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report and accompanying testimony of the Committee on Public Expenditures of the Thirty-Ninth Congress be delivered to the Committee on Public Expenditures of this Congress.

Mr. WOOD. I call for the regular order.

CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the regular order, being Senate bill No. 96, to establish a port of delivery at Chester, Pennsylvania, pending at the adjournment yesterday.

The bill makes Chester, Pennsylvania, a port of delivery, and provides for the appointment of a surveyor, at a salary of $500 per annum.

Mr. BROOMALL. This is a matter that interests only my district. The bill comes from the Treasury Department and is approved by all parties interested. It is a very small matter, and I will not take up the time of the House upon it unless some gentleman desires to ask some question relating to it. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the call of the committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on the Judiciary.

CLAIMS OF NORTHERN CREDITORS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back joint resolution of the House No. 1, relative to claims of certain northern creditors, and recommended concurrence in the amendments of the Senate to the same.

The joint resolution recites the fact that there was paid to the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, prior to the 1st day of May, 1862, a sum exceeding half a million dollars, the proceeds of such confiscation of northern credits, of which there remained to the credit of the confederate States receivers, in such bank, the sum of $219,090 94 only, on the 1st day of May, at the time of the occupation of the city of New Orleans by the forces of the United States, which said sum, by the order of the general then commanding the department of the Gulf, was seized for the benefit of the northern creditors whose debts had been thus confiscated, and said sum was by him sent to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to be by him held in trust for the benefit of said northern creditors; and that owing to a doubt entertained by the Secretary of the Treasury as to his legal authority to distribute said sum of $219,090 94

among the creditors to whom it belongs, and to determine the rights of each to his portion thereof, the money has lain thus undisturbed in the Treasury since July, 1862, to the great injury and detriment of the just and lawful owners thereof; although they may have made many applications to have the same; and therefore resolves,

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a commission of three persons, one of whom shall be learned in the law, to hear and determine the various claims of the parties who are entitled to said sum of $219,090 94, ratably among the persons who shall present their claims and be entitled thereto, to an amount not exceeding the claim of each when confiscated, with interest thereon: Provided, That any claim which shall not be presented within three months after public notice of a meeting of commissioners to receive such claim shall not be allowed or paid by order of said commissioners: And provided further, That the cost of said commission shall be paid out of said money.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

Strike out all after "of" in line eleven of the preamble to "only" in line thirteen, and insert in lieu thereof "$178,897 50."

Strike out all after "of" in line twenty-two of the preamble to "among" in line twenty-three, and insert in lieu thereof "$178,897 50."

Page 2, strike out all after "to" in line three to the end of the resolution, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Take and report to Congress evidence in support of the claims of these several parties whose debts were sequestered and contributed to produce said sum of $178,897 50, together with the date at which such debts were contracted and the interest accrued thereon to the date of such report: Provided, That the said commission shall give public notice of the time and place at which such claims shall be presented by advertising the same in some newspaper published in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans for three months; and no claim shall be considered unless it shall be presented at or before the time so advertised: And provided further, That the cost of said commission shall be paid out of said money.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to lay the resolution and amendments on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. This is following the resolution that passed the House a few days since. It was found that there was an error in the amount of money in the Treasury subject to this appropriation, and accordingly it has been changed from $219,000 to $178,879 50, which was ascertained to be the true sum. The other change is in relation to the report of the commissioners, which is first to be made to Congress for final action here. Unless there are inquiries, I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTWELL. For an inquiry.

Mr. SCOFIELD. This is in effect a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay debts owing by certain rebels to certain loyal men in the North. That is all there is of it, as I understand. It passed the House the other day without much consideration. It occurred to me it was not fully understood at the time. It went through in haste. Therefore I propose at the proper time to move to lay the resolution and amendments on the table.

If I understand it, the commanding general at New Orleans seized certain moneys belonging to the confederate government and deposited them in the Treasury of the United States. He said in making the deposit, as reported, that the fund was to be applied to pay certain creditors at the North whose claims had been confiscated by the rebel States, these being the proceeds of that confiscation. If that order was made by the commanding general it was a simple nullity. He was simply authorized to seize any property that belonged to the rebels or confederate government, and when seized it belonged to the United States. If the confederate government came in possession of that money under the pretext that they were seizing property that belonged to certain men in the North it was a nullity so far as those northern creditors are concerned. They look to their rebel debtors now. The laws of the States and of the United States are open to them; and they can collect their own debts from those whom they favored and by whom they stood before the war, and whom they, many of them, afterward stood by. Now, this money which was seized, being then in the hands of the confederate government, was seized for the benefit of the United States, and ought to be left in the Treasury of the United States, and ought not to be paid out by these men. Now, I propose to move to lay this bill and the amendments upon the table. But I will not do so for the present.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] who has knowledge of this subject.

Mr. BUTLER. If the House will permit me, I will make a simple statement of fact. When the Army of the United States came to New Orleans they found in the hands of various agents of the confederate government ships, steamers, and other property belonging to loyal citizens of the North, but which had been seized by that government. Where the property was in specie, its form had not been changed. Acting on the well-known rule of restitution, the commanding general ordered the ships and other property to be restored.

In examining the accounts of the rebel government in the banks it was found that certain moneys belonging to loyal citizens of the North had been seized by confederate States receivers. Of these moneys there was some which consisted of dividends of a bank or the dividends of an insurance company; some consisted of interest due on mortgages to men in the North; some of freights on charter parties, &c.; all of which the confederate government had ordered to be paid to their receivers; and the money had been so paid to the amount of about half a million dollars. Of that sum there had been drawn out by the confederate government all except about one hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars, the amount embraced in this resolution.

Under these circumstances, after due consideration, that sum was taken possession of by the commanding general. It would have been restored to the loyal owners, except for the reason that there was not enough to pay them all. To avoid any possible injustice that money was sent as a special fund to the Secretary of the Treasury to be distributed. But it remains, not in the Treasury of the United States; it remains in the hands of the Treasurer as such special deposit. It has never gone into the Treasury of the United States; in my judgment it ought never to go there. It was the duty of the United States, by its armies and navies, and by the prompt execution of its laws, to have prevented the rebellion, and thus have protected its citizens in their rights of property. But, alas! we did not act promptly, we did not protect our citizens; and when the conquering Army of the Republic came there it seemed to be their duty to restore to loyal men what the disloyal men had taken from them before the insurrection had ripened into the great war which it afterward became; a public territorial war, altering entirely the rights of individuals as between themselves and the Government.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House in relation to the adjournment of the present session of Congress, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CLAIMS OF NORTHERN CREDITORS—AGAIN.

Mr. SCOFIELD. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] I will state that some citizens of Pennsylvania were the owners of a freighting steamboat on the Ohio river. While the boat was down the Mississippi river somewhere, about the time the rebellion broke out, it was seized by the confederate forces. It was afterward retaken by our forces. The owners of the boat then applied to Congress to have the boat returned to them, it having been captured by our forces as rebel property. The bill was pressed by the able members from Pennsylvania representing the Pittsburg portion of the State; but after consideration and discussion the House determined that the boat should not be surrendered; that it having been taken by the rebels, and then recaptured by our armies, it was enemy's property, and belonged to the Government, and that the owners of that boat must look for redress to the same sources that other loyal citizens must look to for their losses.

But the case here presented is a much worse one. It relates to money now in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the United States. And it is proposed to take that money and distribute it among persons who have legal claims against individuals in the South which they can enforce under our laws.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] has called my attention to the case which he has mentioned; because it illustrates the exact distinction between the two cases. In the case to which he has referred a boat was captured by the enemy's armed forces, and when retaken by our forces the title vested in our Government, and it ought not to have been restored to its former owners. Here was property of citizens of the United States which fell into the hands of the insurrectionists at the beginning of the war. It cannot be considered a capture, and that makes the difference as to the question of right. I examined the question with a great deal of care, and in the case of the steamboat Morning Light, belonging to a gentleman of Pittsburg, I believe after full consideration I returned it to him; and the ground on which I did so was that the owner did not send it into the insurrectionary districts after the war commenced; he did not of his own choice expose it to capture; but he being in the lawful pursuit of his occupation the war overtook him, and his property was taken. If he had sent his steamboat down the Mississippi after the war had commenced, and the steamboat had been captured by the rebels, it would have stood in the same position as any other property taken by act of war.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman a question: when the captured property of a citizen is subsequently recaptured, is not the title of the property re-vested in the lawful owner by the law of postliminy?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, although it is with great diffidence that I differ from so learned a gentleman as my friend from Pennsylvania, and although this question would make on my side, I must say that the jus postliminii applies only to real estate and to slaves under the Roman law, which were quasi real estate for this purpose; that personal property vests ipso facto by the capture in the capturing Government unless recaptured before it is brought to a place of safety.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is a good lawyer, and probably more learned on this question than I am; but my impression is that captures of real estate are not recognized under the law of war. By the general rule (I know a different one prevailed among the Romans, but that was an exceptional case) all "captures by land and sea" are referable I think to personal property only.

Mr. BUTLER. Maritime captures stand on a different ground. But, as I understand, when a portion of territory is captured by a conquering army, that territory belongs to the sovereign. If it has been previously captured by his enemies and has previously belonged to his subjects, the subject's right is re-vested under the jus postliminii; and this is the extent of the doctrine of jus postliminii.

My reason for venturing to differ with my learned friend from Pennsylvania is that I had to discuss this question at great length and with much care with the rebel commissioner of exchange, Judge Ould, in regard to our captured colored soldiers; and I believe I have stated the doctrine with the full limitation. As I understand the question, when the sovereign captures personal property that has been before taken by the enemy from the subject, it instantly vests in the sovereign if it has been brought to a place of safety. If it has not been, then the rule laid down by my friend from Pennsylvania applies. Therefore, I held that a slave captured by us or coming within our lines, even if he had been property at the South, became our property, and we had the right to emancipate him or do what we pleased with him. Therefore every slave escaping from the enemy into our lines became a freeman, and when enlisted in our ranks was to be protected as a soldier; and that the southern confederacy could not set up any right of property in him in his former owner, when captured by them, if there had ever been any such right.

Now, I distinguish the case of this property covered by this resolution from any that has been captured. It was property in the lawful process of business in the South, taken there before the war had commenced. If it had been captured by act of war after the war had commenced, then there was an end of it. It was in a specific form, so that each man could pick out his own share. I think it ought to be restored as an act of justice. As I have already stated, other property acquired in like manner has been restored; and, sir, this would have been restored, but the commanding general had no time to decide upon the rights of these parties. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot do that now, and therefore Congress has been called upon, not to take the money out of the Treasury of the United States, not to pay rebel debts, but for the purpose of restoring the property of loyal men, lost without their fault, and which fell into the possession of the United States, which the Government of the United States as an act of justice ought to return.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will say that the substance of this joint resolution has not been before the Judiciary Committee or before any committee of this House. It was passed originally on the motion of my colleague. The action of the committee relates to amendments in the line of perfecting this resolution, and therefore I was instructed by the committee to report concurrence with the Senate. The committee itself has never passed upon the substantive proposition of the resolution. My individual opinions are in favor of the proposition. On that, however, we do not advise the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York; when the Speaker signed the same.

CLAIMS OF NORTHERN CREDITORS—AGAIN.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I knew very well that the gentleman from Massachusetts last upon the floor, in reporting these amendments, did not give the sanction of the committee with which he is connected to the original resolution, and it was partly because I saw the committee carefully avoided making any comment on it, and because when the resolution passed originally the House did not pay as much attention as it was in the habit of giving such measures, that I proposed to make a test vote on this kind of legislation by moving that it be laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. You will never have any occasion to pass on this kind of thing again in the House, because I believe I can state without prejudice that no money ever was sent here under like circumstances.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There are other moneys in the United States Treasury which might be claimed with more merit by northern creditors than this can be claimed by the men to whom we propose to give it. We have large amounts of money, the proceeds of sales of confiscated cotton, locomotives, cars, and other things; and not only railroads, but other property taken from the confederacy: arms, ammunition, military equipments of various kinds, which have been sold and the money put into the Treasury; and I say that individuals who have suffered from the rebels by the seizure of their property have the same right to come to the Government and ask us to take money out of the Treasury to pay them. When they have claims against southern men you might as well say they ought to have this money which we got for nothing. Why should it not as well be distributed among people who have suffered, who have lost their all during the rebellion? They might as well say "Give us a small portion of the large amount you have realized from the sale of confiscated cotton." They might say "We have no claim against any responsible persons, not even against the Government, but here you have a fund out of which we can be paid." The northern creditor has a claim upon the southern debtor. We have no evidence he is not responsible and the money cannot be collected.

Mr. BUTLER. In the case of captured cotton and other property, Congress has provided that the Court of Claims may restore the property if taken from loyal men.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman misunderstands me. I am not speaking of the men who have lost cotton. I am speaking of men who have perhaps lost their whole fortune, and making them whole out of the money made from confiscated cotton, as the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to make certain northern creditors whole out of moneys we captured.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the gentleman perfectly; but I say in case of all captures of abandoned property we have already provided that the Court of Claims may take jurisdiction and restore that which belongs to loyal men if they file their claims within two years. We cannot send these men to the Court of Claims, because the money has lain in the Treasury for almost five years without any notice being taken of it, and the statute of limitation applies.

This is a case sui generis; it stands on its own merits; and I am only sorry that from my knowledge of the facts these northern men, no one of whom I knew, should have so poor an advocate. The facts are before the House. It is but an act of justice, and it seems rather hard because we can not do justice to all that we should take that which belongs to these men. My friend says that the creditors will have their remedy against their southern debtors. Sir, your bankrupt law, passed last session will cut off all remedy. They have no remedy in fact. You take it away from them, and it is gone forever. If that is the judgment of the House, I bow, as I always do, to constitutional authority.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If this resolution is to pass I think there should be an amendment to it, that the United States should become the trustee of this fund.

Mr. BUTLER. If that is put as a question, I must answer my friend by saying that I would not give him the paper that it is written upon for all these claims. We must deal with great things and not with small.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to lay the resolution and amendments on the table.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 67, noes 23.
Mr. BUTLER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.
So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House as a privileged question the action of the Senate on the resolution of the House in regard to the adjournment of Congress.

The amendment of the Senate was reported, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "concurring," in line two of said resolution, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized, and directed to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 28th instant, at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman has not the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman who originated the resolution is entitled to the floor by usage.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by offering the following as a substitute:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, (the Senate concurring.) That the Senate and House of Representatives do hereby each give consent to the other that each House of Congress shall adjourn the present session from the hour of twelve m., on Thursday, the 28th day of March instant, to assemble again on the first Wednesday of June and the first Wednesday of September, of this year, unless the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall by joint proclamation, to be issued by them ten days before either of the times herein fixed for reassembling, declare that there is no occasion for the meeting of Congress at such time.

The SPEAKER. This as an amendment to the amendment of the Senate, is too large in its character, for this reason: the two branches of Congress have concurred in a part of the resolution. The Senate struck out all after the word "concurring" and inserted what has been read. The part that has been concurred in by both branches is beyond the power of amendment. The gentleman can move to amend by striking out the part amended by the Senate and inserting what he proposes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let the Clerk, then, modify my proposition so that it may be an amendment to the amendment of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the Senate amendment from and after the word "that," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Senate and House of Representatives do hereby each give consent to the other that each House of Congress shall adjourn its present session from the hour of twelve m. on Thursday, the 28th day of March instant, to assemble again on the first Wednesday of June and the first Wednesday of September of this year, unless the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall by joint proclamation, to be issued by them ten days before either of the times herein fixed for assembling, declare that there is no occasion for the meeting of Congress at such time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will move the amendment as read by the Clerk. Now, Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the result of this discussion in the Senate and the House, it is pretty certain that to-morrow will be the last day of this present session of Congress.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is, to a limited extent.

Mr. SCHENCK. As we are, therefore, within the last day of business of our present assembling together, I am admonished not to occupy unnecessarily the time of the House. But I cannot sit here altogether silent when so momentous a question as this is to be settled, as it would be settled if the motion my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] attempted to make should prevail: that the House concur with the Senate in its amendment concerning adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to inquire for information whether, after the gentleman has concluded his remarks, it will be in order for me to submit the motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. A motion to concur is always in order, as tending to bring the two Houses together in their action. But a motion to amend an amendment of the Senate has priority of a motion to concur.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that any motion is in order which tends to bring the two Houses together; and it has precedence of any motion but the motion to amend an amendment of the Senate.

Now, with full knowledge of that fact, and believing that this question is too momentous to be decided in silence, I will occupy the attention of the House for a few moments by stating my reasons for the amendment I have submitted. Day before yesterday, by a vote of nearly three to one, 89 to 31, this House determined that it was not wise for us to leave our places here without some provision being made for the reassembling of Congress between the interval of any adjournment of the present session and the commencement of another regular session of Congress in December next. We therefore provided that such reassembling should take place in the months of May, June, September, and November, with this condition, however: that any of these meetings might be dispensed with by proclamation, to be made in advance by the Presiding Officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, that in their judgment there is nothing in the condition of public affairs which renders it necessary that Congress should reassemble at that time.

The Senate proposes to have no stopping-place between now and December next; to close the present session of Congress to-morrow, and to have no reassembling of this legislative department of the Government until the commencement of its regular session in December next; leaving us in the condition of an entire suspension of any active exercise of legislative functions on the part of Congress, and with no meeting before December next for the purpose of discharging its duties except at the pleasure of the Executive himself. It is a very broad difference of opinion between the two Houses, and one deserving to be very seriously considered.

Sir, I think there is no hour which brings more sadness to a soldier's heart than that in which a retreat is ordered. Or, if it is stating the case too strongly to say that this resembles an order for a general retreat, I think I may say that the hearts of men in the presence of the enemy are apt to feel very heavy when at any time they are called upon to surrender an advanced position near the enemy and fall back and form their lines anew and upon different ground. That is just about the condition in which we now stand with this issue before us.

Now, it may be thought that in this statement there is an intimation that I regard the President as inimical to Congress. Well, sir, put it in whatever phrase you will, whether he be the enemy of Congress, and through Congress of the country, whether Congress be hostile to the President or not, this much is certain: for more than a year past there has been exhibited before the country and the world a struggle between Congress and the President as to which should rule the country, as to the policy of which should prevail in regard to the grave questions connected with the restoration of the Union. Soon after the close of the war the President adopted what he styles his policy. Congress, differing from the President, has by acts of legislation adopted what they regard as the true and legitimate and the safest policy upon this subject. The President does not consent to that which the law-making power has decided upon, but by veto after veto attempts to strike down the hands of the representatives of the people, to stifle their voices as expressed through the statute-book, and to compel them to succumb to his views. Congress is too strong for him, and by overwhelming vote again and again passes these legislative enactments over his veto. But the President does not stand contented when those acts are thus passed. In the vetoes themselves, and in formal State papers communicated to Congress, he denounces what we have done as tyrannical, as oppressive, as an infringement upon the rights of the people of certain sections of this country, and declares that if those people resist such despotic legislation they will enroll themselves among the Hampdens and Sidneyes of the world, the great martyrs for liberty. Here, then, we have not only a difference between these two coördinate branches, but we have the President, through the medium of public documents, with all the weight that his utterances can acquire from such a form, gravely telling the people of a portion of the country that they will ennoble themselves if they resist the orders which may be made by the legislative department that they shall conform to certain terms prescribed to them before they can be restored to their former relations to the Government.

Now, sir, in this condition of things, with this defiance ringing in our ears, uttered no longer ago than on the last day of the last week, it is proposed that we shall abandon our position here, leaving the President, through his agencies and the agencies prescribed by law, to carry out those enactments to the execution of which he avows himself thus disinclined—to use the mildest term that can be applied. It may be said that the law must be obeyed. It may be said that the law will be obeyed by the President. Sir, there are different modes of obeying law. A law may be obeyed apparently, and yet with such a spirit of hostility to the law itself that the execution of that law amounts virtually to nothing. How is the President to carry out the determination of the law-making power with reference to the insurrectionary States? Through the agency of the Army? How will the Army be disposed to carry out the duties assigned to them? Just as you may expect them ordinarily to execute orders which come to them from a chief who is disposed to have those orders executed in the manner most favorable and lenient toward those upon whom the execution of the orders is to operate. Sir, I have seen something of this matter before; and I tell you that if the officers of the Army, knowing this spirit and sentiment upon the part of the President, are called upon to execute in good faith the orders of Congress made to them through the law, they will be subject to all the blandishments, to all the controlling influences which may be expected to tempt men to swerve a little from the direct and straightforward path, when they know that their chief is not hearty in his desire to have the law enforced, and when they know that any sympathy they may exhibit toward those against whom particularly the law is to be executed will be shared by that chief. I am very much afraid of the execution of the law in that way.

Mr. BURR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURR. I desire the gentleman to explain how the facts on which he has commented with regard to the control of the Army would be affected by Congress remaining in session? Does the gentleman propose that Congress shall take the command of the Army?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I propose no such thing. I propose that while we watch the President, to prevent him from usurping power, we shall not ourselves commit any such usurpation. But I maintain that while we have it in our power it is better for us to be at hand to watch the mode in which these things are done, so that, should evil come or be threatened in the manner of the execution of the law, we may hedge about the safety of the Republic by such acts of legislation as shall keep the President and those who act under him in check. Sir, if Congress had not met or been about to meet, and if Congress when it met had not acted by investigation of such acts as the riot, as it was termed, giving it the mildest epithet, at New Orleans, does any man suppose the President, unbridled in the exercise of his power by this watchful care of Congress, would not have given to us in various shapes repetitions of just such scenes as that?

Mr. Speaker, what is a part of this history through which we have just gone? In September and the early part of October last I believe, as I believe in my own existence, it was the fixed purpose of the President of the United States that this Fortieth Congress should not assemble at all constituted as it now is. He meant to have had a Congress here consisting of those representatives of the North who would go with him in a scheme of that kind and those claiming to be elected from rebel States, and constituting if they might a majority, and to recognize them as the Fortieth Congress. The elections in October and November cured him somewhat of that purpose; not perhaps of the spirit, but they took away from him the prospect of being able to exercise such power. Still the people of the country were uneasy; still the people of the country were apprehensive; and I say that all good, true, loyal men breathed freer when Congress passed a law which required hereafter this first session should take place on the 4th of March, the very day of the commencement of its proper term. We have met on the 4th of March, and we have adopted certain acts of legislation. Those acts of legislation have not yet commenced to operate on the subjects of them. We know not what difficulties there may be, but we do know, I think, if we judge wisely of this matter, that it will be well for us to come together at short periods, at a much shorter interval of time than from now to December, with a view to be witnesses of the manner in which these laws shall operate and be carried out, to apply the remedy and correction if any amendment or change be made necessary, and to meet any failure in the execution of the law, as we now expect. That is what I mean.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. As a basis for the question which I propose to put to the honorable gentleman, I admit that if his amendment prevails, and which provides for the meeting of Congress on the first Wednesday in June next, it will be fixing a time for the reassembling of Congress by law in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Now, the question which I propose to submit to my honorable colleague is this: if a meeting of Congress is fixed by law, I want my friend to tell us where in the Constitution he finds the provision which gives to the House the right to delegate to the Speaker the legislative power to repeal or suspend such laws?

Mr. SCHENCK. We are not proposing to delegate the power of assembling Congress to the Speaker of this House. We are proposing that the House and Senate shall concur to meet at a particular time, and we delegate to the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate a very different power, the power to pronounce to us whether in their opinion the condition of the country does or does not require a meeting of Congress. It is not a repeal of the law to meet or not to meet. It is an adjournment; it is the extension of a recess; and the gentleman might as well say that we repeal the law by which we meet here this evening or at any other time when we adjourn or take a recess.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it not delegating to the Speaker power to adjourn Congress?

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, suppose it be, we have power to delegate it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Where does the gentleman find that power in the Constitution or the laws?

Mr. SCHENCK. I find it in that power inherent in a legislative body like this to quit, at any time it pleases, its business.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. The Constitution provides that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall, by law, fix a different day.

Mr. SCHENCK. The difficulty with the gentleman is he has not read the whole of the constitutional provision on that subject. If he will look at the last clause of the fifth section of the first article he will find a provision precisely corresponding to this resolution, namely, that neither House can adjourn beyond three days without the consent of the other. I propose that each House by the amended resolution shall consent that the other adjourn to certain days indicated. The gentleman has only referred to a clause in the Constitution not applicable to the question we are now discussing.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. The gentleman is right in regard to that provision of the Constitution, but does that provision contemplate power in the Speaker or power in the House to delegate to the Speaker authority to repeal or suspend an existing law?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I hold that to be inherent in our power as a legislative body. We may elect a Speaker, for instance, by our votes, or we may appoint my colleague [Mr. VAN TRUMP] to declare who shall be Speaker, and the House may consent to his selection. The mode of action in regard to adjournment is left to the discretion of the House.

Now, the gentlemen on the other side have given us a lesson which I propose to pass over to gentlemen on this side of the House. Do you not observe, [addressing himself to the Republican side,] that every man on the other side wants you to adjourn, and interposes every possible objection and motion in order to prevent you from staying here or reassembling at any time before next December?

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman must address the Chair and not his colleagues. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Ah! Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask my friends on this side of the House, the Union Republicans of this body, to observe the fact that upon every question connected with adjournment we are met with an undivided solid phalanx on the other side; that every man on the other side will be found voting to get this Congress out of the way, and keep it out of the way as long as it can possibly be kept from its post of duty.

Mr. GETZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. I decline.

Mr. CHANLER. I enter a general denial of all the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is out of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in joint resolutions of the following titles:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 47) in relation to removal of Indian tribes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) authorizing the transfer of certain funds, and providing for the purchase of seeds and their distribution in the southern States.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentlemen do not want to consider the question as one open to discussion. They want us to go away, and they want us to stay away. They want no Congress here between now and December next; and upon my soul I believe they would not have us reassemble in December if they could help it. And in this they but reflect the wishes of the President himself; for the intimation has been given out, not to be mistaken, that there is nothing at this moment which he is more desirous of than that the present difference between the House and Senate should be carried to such an extent that he might exercise what he would claim as his prerogative of dismissing us to our homes. I think there is a lesson in this manifestation which it will be well for gentlemen who cooperate with me in support of the views and policy which we advocate to lay to heart.

Now, sir, to go back to the question in regard to the execution of the laws which we have just passed in reference to the reconstruction of the rebel States, how will those laws be executed? Sir, if we adjourn I venture to say it will not be thirty days before some question of construction will arise as to who shall vote or who shall not vote, who shall do this or shall do that; and does any man doubt upon which side of that question of reconstruction the opinion of the President and those who sustain him will be found when there is no legislative department here to correct that omission by new legislative provisions if they shall be found to be necessary?

Why, sir, when the Supreme Court made that extraordinary decision in the Milligan case, in which it was held that no hostile foot had ever been upon the soil of Indiana, announcing what was not true and giving judgment in favor of a lie, does any one fail to remember that immediately afterward, when a case was pending in Virginia where a wanton murder had been committed in the interest of rebel sympathy, the President hastened to apply that decision to that particular case, going beyond the construction or understanding, as it now appears, even of the court itself?

Sir, in every case where there is a difference, where there is a question, where there is a doubt, as in complicated laws of this kind, as there unquestionably will be in regard to the application of the laws, or their true interpretation as applied to the restoration of these States, you may rely upon it there will be extraordinary application of the law, and extraordinary construction of it made in the interest of the rebels, who are to be shielded and protected thereby. And therefore I implore Congress not to leave now; or if they leave, I implore them to make provision for any needful return at an early day, so as to be on the watch, so as to be at hand, so as to be ready to apply such remedies as legislative wisdom and power can devise in case of such events as these.

And there are other reasons. I will not go at length into this question of impeachment. I differ from a great many upon the floor of this House in regard to that subject. There are differing opinions in regard to what are impeachable offenses. There are men in this country, able lawyers it is said, who insist upon it that the provision in the Constitution which declares that the President, the Vice President, and other civil officers may be impeached for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, relates only to those things which are punishable under statute-law. Now, if that be so, if that is to be taken as the legitimate construction of our power to impeach, then we stand upon very narrow ground indeed, so far as that means of protection can be interposed against usurpation, tyranny, or wrong-doing of any kind upon the part of those who fill the offices of this country. If it be true that that is all the Constitution means, then, should Andrew Johnson appear in this Hall day after day during our entire session, drunk and incapable of the performance of any duty of any kind, we could not impeach him, because that would not be an indictable offense under our statutes; it would not be a high crime and misdemeanor in the opinion of gentlemen who construe our Constitution in that way. If Andrew Johnson, having under the Constitution the right to interpose his veto, present his objections to and refuse his approval of the laws we may pass, should employ himself day after day at the other end of the avenue in vetoing every bill which we might pass, according to the opinions of those gentlemen he could not be impeached for thus obstructing the operations of the legislative department of the Government. I say that neither Judge Story nor any other jurist who has written upon this subject, and whose opinions are worth considering at all, has ever assented to any such absurdity.

Then, what are we doing in the matter? We have been apparently nursing along for the last two or three months a proposition to investigate the conduct of the President with a view to his impeachment. I am one of those who believe that so close an investigation, with a view to discovering particular peccadillos concealed from the public eye, was hardly necessary when the history of the country for the last eighteen months is but a history of usurpation upon his part, of defiance of the law-making power, the truth of which assertion is presented in the very public documents which he himself has given to the country and to the world.

Andrew Johnson defies the legislative department of this Government; Andrew Johnson claims that he himself is the State, the Government; Andrew Johnson insists upon doing himself all those acts necessarily legislative in their character, which prescribe the forms and the plan upon which these rebellious States shall be restored. And when Congress acts, he turns to these people in the rebellious States, who are the subjects of that legislation, and says to them: "All this that the law-making power is doing is usurpation, is tyranny, is oppression; and if you were to resist it you would rank yourselves among the Hampdens and Sidneys, the great martyrs of liberty and freedom throughout the world," thus preaching rebellion in his very official papers.

Now, I think that grave and great political crimes like these are proper subjects for impeachment; much more so than anything which may be ascertained by any investigation, though it should amount to the stealing of a five-dollar note. But no matter what may be the differences of opinion among us upon the question, we have entered upon this investigation; and I say we shall be recreant if we do not either carry it out vigorously, promptly, speedily, in such way as to come to some conclusion upon it, or else upon the ground of expediency, or any other which may be thought proper, magnanimously abandon the further pursuit of the subject.

And yet we have decided to do neither. We have neither decided to abandon it, to give it up as an inexpedient undertaking, and upon the ground that the game is not worth the pursuit; nor have we shown ourselves disposed to pursue it vigorously and bring it to some effective conclusion. I think we ought not to adjourn until we decide this matter one way or the other.

Then, again, there lies here close to our doors a difficulty. What is the condition of the State of Maryland? The spirit of rebellion is there triumphant at this very hour; and those who are animated by hostility to the national Government, having obtained by fraud the control of the government of that State, are seeking to use fraud for the perpetuation of itself, for the continuance of fraud upon the rights of the people of the State. A convention to frame a new constitution has been called in a manner expressly prohibited by the present constitution of the State. And we have the assurance that when the disloyal people of the State move in this irregular way, there will be a movement made upon the part of the Union people, in order that they, too, in an irregular way (if irregular ways are to be resorted to) may have their convention and adopt their constitution. Under these circumstances I believe upon my soul a collision attended with bloodshed is inevitable in that State before the approaching summer is over, unless there be a moral and a legal influence exerted by the near presence of the legislative department of this Government, in the full exercise of its functions, to prevent the sympathy, if not the active coöperation of those who might interfere against the loyal men of Maryland.

Maryland lies in immediate proximity to this Capitol: you have no access to this spot except through her Territory; and with this dark prospect, with this gloomy cloud looming up here at our very doors, it is proposed that the members of this Congress shall abandon their posts, go home and leave it to the President to do as he pleases. Sir, does any one doubt that if such a collision should take place, all and more than all that was enacted in New Orleans will be enacted again, if not by the direct connivance, at least with no sympathy against its commission, upon the part of those who are in authority at the other end of the avenue.

Mr. KELLEY. In connection with the gentleman's remarks as to the condition of affairs in Maryland, I would like the Clerk to read a letter which I received yesterday morning from one of the most distinguished citizens of Maryland—a man in every way trustworthy.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield for the purpose of having the letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It would have been better for us (if Congress adjourns now without considering Maryland's situation) had we died with the South as traitors, and come up with them in the resurrection of reconstruction. The Legislature has tied us, as far as their little sense and their blindness of malice would allow, hand and foot; they have called a convention and given the power of it to the late slaveholding counties arbitrarily; they have perpetuated slavery in the negro-apprentice code, and cut off all remedy in State courts, by shutting up the criminal court of Baltimore to such complaints; they have determined to make us pay for slaves by appointing a commissioner in each county to register the number and the proprietorship; they have provided remuneration for all officers who resist the civil rights bill, and allow no negro testimony; they have refused to pass a bill allowing them to testify; they have put the militia of the State under rebel control, and exclude, not in terms but in fact, the blacks from enrollment; they have increased the old Kane police to five hundred men, and now, if you gentlemen choose to sit in Washington, your armed enemy is not on the other side of the Potomac, but on this. Congress ought not to adjourn till it hear from our Radical convention, which meets on Wednesday, (27th,) nor until it has passed a law directing how this reconstruction shall take place in Maryland, and putting us on the same footing with other slaveholding States.

"I implore you to use your influence to keep it there, no matter how wearied you are, as I know you must be."

Mr. SCHENCK. That is but a confirmation of what I was saying; and if we need other confirmation, we have it in the very able memorial upon this subject signed by the Union members of the Legislature of Maryland. That memorial, which was presented a few days ago by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] and referred to one of the committees, shows that the condition of things in that State requires watchful care. I take the liberty to embody that memorial as a part of my remarks:

"To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

"The undersigned, members of the General Assembly of Maryland, respectfully present this memorial to your honorable body on the condition of public affairs in this State, to which they ask the immediate consideration of the national Legislature. The General Assembly of Maryland is about to adjourn, after a session as memorable for evil and as important to the country as that which consigned the Legislature of 1861 to the casemates of Fort Warren. Elected in great part by the deliberate violation of the election law of the State, by the votes of men who were in active accord with the rebellion, and whose hatred to the Government rendered the presence of military force during the war necessary to prevent their active aid to the rebels in arms, and in spite of which they did give large aid in men and money, they have marked their session by a series of acts to which we desire to call your attention. The rebels of Maryland sent South during the war some twenty thousand soldiers to the rebel army. These men have nearly all returned, and a large immigration from the South since the war has largely added to that number. By a doubtful construction of a clause in the existing constitution this General Assembly, thus elected, has enfranchised all white men, no matter what treason they may have committed, and has thus added to the voting population about thirty thousand persons who have only lately ceased an armed resistance to the Government. Not satisfied with this, they have just passed a militia bill which, in direct defiance of the present constitution of the State, has made all white rebels, no matter what their previous treason, part of the militia.

"They have by deliberate vote refused to exclude even from the highest office under the law any person, no matter what his rank in the rebel army, and they are about to put in force this law, the effect of which is against our own constitution and the Army laws of Congress; to put in the rear of the capital an armed force, composed largely of the same men who have just been forced to cease armed attempts to capture the capital. One great reason of this bill is to better carry out the scheme of revolutionizing the government of the State, abolishing the existing constitution, and making another still more firmly fastening on the necks of the loyal people the yoke of rebel control. The present constitution of Maryland, while it does not allow colored suffrage, does not give to the late masters the right to represent in the Legislature their disfranchised freedmen. It bases representation on white population. These conspirators, not satisfied with controlling the Legislature and the executive department, have passed a bill calling a convention for a constitutional convention on the 10th day of April, the convention to meet on the second Monday of May, 1867. This they have done, although the constitution provides that the Legislature shall pass no laws providing for a change in the existing constitution, except in the mode therein prescribed; and although the constitution regulates the representation in any convention called to make a new constitution by fixing it the same as that of each county in the General Assembly, they have fixed an arbitrary basis of representation which, while it excludes the colored man from the ballot-box, gives to the old worn-out counties, which were as rebellious as South Carolina, an increased representation, by which the oppressor is to represent the oppressed against his will, and by which a minority of the people of the State are to hold in their proposed convention the same power as the majority.

"The State of Maryland has at present a colored population of at least two hundred thousand, and by immigration since the war perhaps two hundred and fifty thousand, making a voting population of from forty to fifty thousand. In most of the counties whose representation has been thus illegally increased the colored population is equal to or greater than the white. The House of Representatives of the United States has already passed a resolution of inquiry whether the present constitution of this State is now republican, and since the colored man is now a citizen it may well be doubtful whether a State which excludes for no crime one fourth of its population who are citizens is republican. This General Assembly has inaugurated, however, a movement which, from the illegal representation made in the bill itself, actually now accomplishes not only the exclusion of this population from suffrage, but also gives the disloyal population a representation for them. The present judiciary of the State is for the most part loyal, and one object of this movement is to legislate out all the remaining loyal officers whom they have not already removed, and place ex-rebels, perhaps brigadiers and colonels of the rebel army, in their places. Not satisfied with the pardon and the charity which Union men have extended, they have commenced a reaction against the results of the war, and determined on a policy which, if unchecked, destroys a loyal constitution and puts in its place one made by traitors and flagrantly anti-republican, and places an armed militia of disloyal men and a minority government of rebel sympathizers and rebels in the complete possession of this State. While the South is about to commence a career of freedom and progress, these men, untaught by the lessons of the past, have determined by the forms of law, but in violation of both the State and Federal law, to put this State back into a condition of darkness and slavery.

"These acts, we submit, are in violation of State and national law—oppressive, revolutionary, and dangerous to the order and peace of the nation. The Union men of Maryland are groaning under this tyranny. They are now oppressed by verdicts of disloyal juries in many counties. Immigration into the State, except from the South, is stopped, and some loyal men are deliberating on leaving the State. The most, however, are ready, by all proper means, at all personal hazards, to resist this infamous attempt of oppression. The danger of bloodshed is imminent; the time is perilous. We call on Congress not to adjourn before settling this grave matter, which, if not settled, may startle them in their recess by something worse than the massacre at New Orleans, although not so unequal and one-sided. We earnestly ask, on the part of the majority of the people of Maryland, deprived of legal voice, except through us, a minority of the General Assembly, that Congress will guaranty to us a republican form of government on the only basis of right, truth, and peace—impartial suffrage, without respect to race or color—as it has already guarantied it to the southern States.

"Signed by seven Senators and twelve members of the House of Delegates."

Now, sir, I come back to the question as to what the President will probably do if he can get us out of the way and keep us out of the way until next winter? Suppose that by a writ of habeas corpus or otherwise the question should be made before Judge Field or Judge Davis or any of those gentlemen concurring in the Milligan decision, and it should be claimed that any one arrested under our recent legislation on the subject of reconstruction must be discharged upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of all that Congress has done on this question, do you suppose that there would not be found a decision to suit the occasion? Do you suppose you would not have an Executive ready at once then to withdraw all the military force from these States and leave them in the condition in which we found them, or worse, at the close of the war? I say we have no assurance what is to be the result of our legislation when applied in practice; but we have every reason to believe that between now and next December such decisions will be made, such course taken, such construction put upon the law, as far as may seem to be on the face of it, at any rate, within the power of the Executive, as to deprive that law of all its vital force.

At this very hour I repose more confidence in the acquiescence of the rebels themselves at the South in that much we have done than any expectation or hope from the Executive in having it done well. Why, sir, at this very moment these rebels all over the South are ready to accept the situation, and accept it in such way as means something, while here is exhibited the strange spectacle of the head of the Government himself, of the President of the United States, inciting them and encouraging them and imploring them as they are patriots and freemen not to submit to the laws which have been enacted, which he has not approved, but which Congress has passed over his head.

Some gentleman asks me if there be not some arrière pensée, something behind the Supreme Court thus adjourning to meet at an early day. I do not wish to cast any imputation on that court, even by supposing they had any such thought as that. But the singular spectacle is proposed to be presented of an Executive who shall be continuous in the exercise of his power, of a judiciary which shall adjourn from day to day, and always on hand to exercise its power, while the legislative department is called upon to give up its ability to act entirely, except that action may be permitted by the will of the man who is arraying himself continually pretty much against all they do. It is madness for any one to expect that the President will in any contingency call us together, and it is only for the two Houses to say, while the other departments of the Government continue their power without interval, without any interregnum, that we shall meet the expectations of the people when we provided this Congress should assemble at the commencement of its term on the 4th of March. If we adjourn now until December we might as well perhaps not have met at all.

The gentleman from Illinois asks me to give him a portion of my time, and I would like to know how much I have left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I give six minutes to the gentleman from Illinois and three minutes to a gentleman on the Committee on the Judiciary who has some explanations to make, which he deems important, in reply to what was said the other day.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not indulged before in the discussion of this question of adjournment, but inasmuch as I have opposed in my votes any adjournment at all, I desire to give my reasons for thus acting. If we will cast about the House we will find the proceedings of this Congress are rather anomalous, and this question of adjournment, presented to the country as it is, requires us in our own minds to answer more than the mere question why shall we adjourn now.

First, why is it that the Congress of the United States passed a law assembling the Fortieth Congress on the 4th day of March? There must be a reason, sir, why that law was passed. What was the reason for the passage of that law? There must have been something which operated upon the members who voted for that law, thus placing it upon the statute-book as one of the laws for them to obey. If there was a reason for the assembling of the Fortieth Congress, what was that reason? It cannot be said it was merely to pass a supplemental bill to the reconstruction bill, for that was not thought of or proposed at the time this law was passed. It must have been for a different reason.

It was because at the time when the angry clouds of war were passing away, and the bright rays of the sun of peace were shining forth, there was still a necessity for the guards on the watch-tower to see that no harm came to the Republic. It was for that reason; and I ask honorable members to tell me if the same reasons for assembling the guards at the posts for the preservation of this country which existed on the 4th of March do not exist now? Has there been any change in the conduct of the affairs of the Administration? Has there been any change in the policy of the men at the head of the Government? Veto after veto is sent to this House, the same policy is persisted in as heretofore; and yet we are told that this Congress, which assembled in accordance with law on the 4th of March, must adjourn without having passed one great measure except the supplemental reconstruction bill.

I ask honorable gentlemen here to-day who voted for this assembling of the Fortieth Congress what they will say when they go home to their constituents? How will they explain their action to them when they are asked, "Why, after you voted for this law convening the Fortieth Congress, did you sit four weeks accomplishing so little?" With but two or three standing committees appointed, we placed ourselves before the country as if enacting a farce. Did we assemble here to place ourselves in that ridiculous attitude before the country, as a set of men without backbone enough to do that which we called ourselves together to do? I want to know if members will feel justified in sitting here four weeks, taking up bills from the Speaker's table from day to day and passing them without reference to an appropriate committee or referring them to some committee to be appointed at some future time, God only knowing when they will be brought back for action?

But what, I repeat, will you say to your constituents when they ask you these questions, when they ask you why you did not have your committees appointed, so that you might legislate? Will you answer, "We could not do anything because we were not prepared to legislate?" Then they will ask you, "Were you not alarmed lest the Chief Magistrate of the nation would fail in the execution of your laws?"

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot be interrupted by questions during the short time I am allowed by courtesy.

Mr. SPALDING. I wanted to vindicate the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] or any other member has a right to criticize the Chair for not appointing committees.

Mr. WOOD. Has not the hour expired?

The SPEAKER. Not quite; there is one minute remaining.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will allow a word to be said in reply.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if the previous question is seconded, the first question will be on the amendment, or whether a motion to concur in the Senate amendment will not take priority?

The SPEAKER. The occasion on which a motion to concur has priority is when there is a motion to insist on a disagreement, and then the motion to recede takes precedence of the motion to concur.

Mr. SPALDING. If the amendment is voted down it will then be in order to move to concur.

The SPEAKER. It will.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 64, noes 35; and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], and then on the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Will there be no further opportunity to amend?

The SPEAKER. There will not.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 51, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Churchhill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eila, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Baldwin, Barnes, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanter, Cornell, Denison, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Getz, Glessbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Laffin, Lincoln, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Nocli, Poland, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitzgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Taber, Twitchell, Van

Auken, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Wood—51.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Beaman, Bromwell, Cobb, Dawes, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Thomas, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—38.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

During the call of the roll, the following announcements were made:

Mr. SHANKS. My colleague, Mr. JULIAN, is absent by leave of the House, on account of the illness of a member of his family.

Mr. WARD. My colleague, Mr. VAN AERNAM, has gone home in consequence of ill-health. If he were here he would undoubtedly vote "ay" on this question.

Mr. ARCHER. My colleague, Mr. STONE, is detained home by extreme illness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, as amended, was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to make a privileged remark. I did not hear some remarks by the Speaker, which gentlemen about me say he made a few moments since. I am told that at the close of my remarks the Speaker said that I had a right to reflect upon the action of the Speaker if I so desired.

Now, I assure the Speaker that there was no intention or desire on my part to reflect upon the integrity of the Speaker, or to insinuate anything against him. If the Speaker made any such remark, I am sorry for it, for he must have done so under a misapprehension. What I said was this: that we had been sitting here now for four months without the committees of the House being appointed. I meant no reflection by that; I was merely stating a fact known to the country. The fact is so, and it is as much the fault of the House as of the Speaker. There was no intention on my part to reflect upon the Speaker at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not make the remark to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN], but to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING], who, as the Chair understood, rose to a point of order, and objected to the gentleman from Illinois criticising the action of the Speaker of the House. To that the Chair replied that the gentleman from Illinois, or any other gentleman who might desire to do so, had a perfect right to criticize the action of the Speaker. The Chair had taken the responsibility of not exercising the right given him by the rules of appointing all the standing committees of the House, knowing very well that some members might complain of it. But at the beginning of this session the Chair stated that for obvious reasons, meaning the absence of a number of Representatives of States represented in the last Congress, he would not arrogate to himself the right given him under the rules of appointing now all the standing committees of this House unless he was ordered so to do by the House; in which case, being the servant of the House, and fully acknowledging their right to direct him, he would obey. The House, from time to time, has ordered him to appoint several standing and select committees. But the Chair felt that in the present anomalous condition of things it was his duty not to surprise the House some morning by the announcement of all the standing committees unless so ordered by the House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] commented upon the fact that the committees of the House had not yet been appointed by the Chair. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] objected to the criticism. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] or any other member, had the right to criticise the Chair for not appointing the committees, as the House understood exactly what the case was.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood from gentlemen about me that the Chair had made his remarks in reply to remarks made by me, otherwise I should not have said anything now.

Mr. SPALDING. My design was only to give the reason for the action of the Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been requested to ask leave of absence for Mr. VAN AERNAM, Mr. ORTH, and Mr. HUNTER, for the remainder of the session.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House will now resume the consideration of reports from committees during the remainder of the morning hour, which has been interrupted by the consideration of the resolution relating to adjournment.

CLAIMS BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution concerning the payment of claims made by foreign Governments against the United States for property destroyed by the armies of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, declares that, in the opinion of Congress, no claim made by other Governments or by citizens or subjects of other Governments for losses of property sustained by such Governments, citizens, or subjects during the recent rebellion should be recognized or allowed by the Executive Departments of this Government until the same shall have been submitted to Congress with all the facts relating thereto.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is substantially the same as one which was referred to the committee upon the motion of one of my colleagues. The object is to prevent the offset of any claims we may have against the Government of Great Britain by a recognition or allowance of claims on the part of that nation against this Government or its citizens until the facts and evidence shall have been submitted to Congress. I presume there can be no objection to the resolution, and I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRITISH AMERICAN CONFEDERATION.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution respecting the proposed confederation of Provinces on the northern frontier of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, declares that the people of the United States cannot regard the proposed confederation of the Provinces on the northern frontier of this country without extreme solicitude; that a confederation of States on this continent, extending from ocean to ocean, established without consulting the people of the Provinces to be united, and founded upon monarchical principles, cannot be considered otherwise than in contravention of the traditions and constantly-declared principles of this Government, endangering its most important interests, and tending to increase and perpetuate embarrassments already existing between the two Governments immediately interested.

Mr. BANKS. I call the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. There is a single question of fact in reference to which I should like to be informed before we are called upon to vote.

Mr. BANKS. I yield for any inquiry.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it true that the people to be embraced in this new confederation have not, as represented through their Legislatures, consented to the action of the British Government? Are the committee sure as to the fact stated in the resolution? It is desirable that we shall not in our resolutions make averments of fact which cannot be sustained.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that a principal point of the contest in the Provinces, and also with the opponents of this measure in the British Government, is that the proposition to confederate these Provinces on the northern frontier has never been submitted to the people of the colonies, though the Legislatures of most of the colonies have assented to it. One of the Provinces, Nova Scotia, by a remonstrance signed by thirty thousand of its citizens, has protested against the confederation. The citizens joining in this remonstrance constitute a majority of all who would be permitted to vote even under our laws; yet the Legislature of Nova Scotia has approved and consented to the confederation. That I understand to be the fact.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the committee has not seen proper to refer to monarchical Governments attempted to be established in other portions of the continent than upon the northeast; and I would ask the chairman whether the committee have considered the resolution referred to them in the early part of the session, relating to the establishment of monarchical Governments anywhere on the American continent. The attention of Congress has been demanded, not only to the contemplated monarchy in Canada, but also to the attempted monarchy in Mexico. The principle implied in this resolution calls, in my judgment, for not only a general expression of opinion with reference to the establishment of monarchical Governments, but a declaration of sympathy for republican Governments elsewhere. And I would like to have had that committee make a report in sympathy with the struggling people of Ireland, who are seeking to establish a republican government there. I now ask the chairman what has become of the resolution referred to them in the early part of the session sympathizing with the people of Ireland, as well as against the establishment of monarchical Governments anywhere on this continent?

Mr. BANKS. The committee has instructed me to report a resolution in answer to the one presented by the gentleman from New York, and it will be submitted after this resolution has been acted on.

In regard to this resolution, Mr. Speaker, it was thought to express the views of the House on the question immediately pending. It is regarded that the question of monarchical or imperial government in Mexico has been settled. We are notified that the French troops have been withdrawn. The last soldier has left, and the Emperor, if he has not already left, will soon leave. It was not regarded as necessary nor involved in the resolution of the gentleman from New York that subject being more immediately and directly connected with the interests of the country, and requiring more positive action than the expression of opinion, has been left for future consideration.

Mr. CHANLER. I want to see whether I understand the resolution. I agree with the principles which underlie it; but it seems to me to be illogical. The gentleman protests against the establishment of a monarchical Government to northeast of this Union. If Great Britain rules her colonies under a monarchical form of government, why not meet it at once, and say we take issue with Great Britain in holding any dominions on this continent, unless she gives them the right of self-government such as we now have? A monarchical form of government does exist in Canada to-day. The Queen of England rules that Government directly to-day under the laws of England and under the imperial system of England. I do not see that the resolution contains anything positive; that it fulminates anything from this Congress which is going to disturb a hair of the British lion; and unless he intends to carry this matter to some point which will make our power felt, I think it is wiser for us to remain silent. If we propose to make up a political issue with Great Britain as to the form of government in her colonies on this continent, well and good. Let us insist on the independence of Canada, and take up arms with Canada on that issue.

This resolution means nothing. It contains nothing which is true. It assumes the Government of Canada to-day is not monarchical. I merely make the suggestion as the tendency of my views on this question.

Mr. BANKS. It was not the intention of the committee to present any menace or any threat or to make any protest on this question, not even to determine the character, but looking to positive results proposed in her colonies by the Government of Great Britain. But it does express an opinion, so far as this changed condition of the colonies is concerned, extending as they do from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, representing principles hostile to the interests, antagonistic to the Government of this country, that it cannot but be regarded with solicitude and as in contravention of the rights and interests of this Government. Beyond that the committee did not think it was proper to go, nor is further action required at this time. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SYMPATHY FOR IRELAND.

Mr. BANKS. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House extend its sympathy to the people of Ireland and of Candia in all their just efforts to maintain the independence of States, to elevate the people, and to extend and perpetuate the principles of liberty.

Mr. BANKS. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, how much remains of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not intend at this time to make any lengthy remarks, and yet I desire to make some observations rather than let this resolution pass in silence. I trust before this Congress adjourns I shall have an opportunity of introducing a stronger resolution than this. I presume I may say, without any disrespect to the chairman of the committee, or to the other members of the committee, or without referring to anything that may have occurred in the committee, that I should have preferred a much more decided expression of sympathy than this. But such as it is I trust it will pass as the beginning of good things. Before this Congress expires I hope to have the privilege of introducing a resolution not only of sympathy, but acknowledging the belligerent rights and independence of Ireland.

I throw this out in no spirit of bravado. I believe the independence of Ireland will come. I believe that the train of circumstances now in operation will bring about that result.

"Truth crushed to earth shall rise again."

Long as Ireland has been crushed she will yet rise and maintain a position among the nations of the earth.

Nor can England take any exception to our interfering in this matter. She has no more business with Ireland than we have. She has no right, title, or claim whatever in that country except that which had its origin in fraud and force. She took possession of Ireland by force and fraud, and she has made that country through seven centuries of oppression a howling wilderness. She has inflicted wrongs upon that people which no other nation under the sun has suffered from another. She has perpetrated crimes and outrages such as no other civilized nation has dared to inflict. English rule became a curse to the people of Ireland and "the curse of Cromwell," one of England's instruments in subduing Ireland, became the synonym of everything cruel and oppressive.

But, as I have said, I will not go into the details of the wrongs of Ireland, nor enter into any lengthy argument to show why we have a right and that it is our duty to interfere. In conversation with the Chaplain of the House to-day reference was made to the parable of the good Samaritan. Sir, I maintain that we have the same authority to interfere that the good Samaritan had when he saw a stranger by the wayside who had fallen among thieves and lay beaten and bruised. We can at least extend our sympathy to the fallen and oppressed if we cannot give them more substantial proofs of our friendship. There is hardly a Government in Europe that does not interfere with the affairs of other countries. Napoleon dictates where the lines of empire shall run. Emperors and kings are all the time making new maps of Europe and running new boundaries of kingdoms and empires. There is no monarch, great or small, on the European continent that has not interfered and dictated terms to his neighbors, provided he thought he was strong enough to enforce them. And, sir, has not the great Republic of the West the right also at least to be heard in protesting against the wrongs of other nations? Have we not at least a right to take part in preventing tyrants from acts of oppression?

I may be asked what are Ireland's chances of success? Her chances for success are greater than any other people ever had who have achieved their independence. They are all rebels in Ireland. There is not to-day an honest Irishman upon the face of the earth who is not a rebel against British rule in Ireland. The distinguished plenipotentiary who now represents her Britannic Majesty near this Government is a descendant of one of the most famous of Irish rebels, the Bruce of Bannockburn. There is no nobility of blood in Ireland but that which has sprung from rebellion against English rule over Ireland, and has been sanctified by suffering in the prison or on the scaffold in the cause of the liberty of their country.

The sympathies of all the world are with Ireland, while England has the sympathy of no human being except its office-holders and garrisons. It is something to have the sympathy of mankind with you against your oppressors.

Now, we are told that Ireland cannot govern herself. That statement is not true; Ireland can govern herself. Irish intellect to-day governs the world; Irish intellect is good enough to govern England. Even the poorer sort of Irishmen, like the late Duke of Wellington, proves good enough for that business. Irish intellect to-day is uppermost in all the transactions of England. She rules in her Parliament; she directs her press; she commands her armies; she fights her battles. Why may she not do so for herself? Ireland to-day has more disciplined men than any nation in the world, men who have learned the use of arms, who have smelled gunpowder; they are all over the world, in every clime, in every land. Irish valor of the second generation has bloomed into glory upon every battle-field of this and other countries, leading the armies of Spain by an O'Donnell, the armies of France by a McMahon and Neil, the armies of Austria by a Nugent. In these United States, upon this very floor, may be found Irishmen of the second generation, whose deeds I need not recount, as they are on everybody's lips, and are a part of the history of this country. Look through the history of the late war, and see how many of the generals, and, above all, of the private soldiers were Irish by birth or blood, who have fought and bled for our glorious flag.

To-day Ireland can raise the strongest army the world ever saw. Her sons have been disciplined in the British army, in the Army of this country, and of every country in the world. She has more men now scattered throughout the world ready to come to her assistance than would under equal advantages conquer twenty Englands if they stood in her way.

I know the great difficulty is in gaining the first success. But other countries have achieved their independence without the strength that is behind this movement, and some time, in God's own good time, Ireland will be able to take that first step in her forward movement, and then there will be no holding her back. The first step gained everything else is easy.

I trust this resolution will pass this House without objection. It is time for these United States to take a firm stand with our foreign relations and maintain a dignified position upon all questions connected with them. I long for the day to come when we shall have no more of these criminations and recriminations among ourselves; when we shall cease these bickerings about our own firesides, and look to the condition of affairs abroad. Above all do I long for the day when in place of abusing each other at home we shall, as a reunited and undivided people, adopt and pursue such a policy toward other nations as will secure our citizens from the insults heaped upon them throughout the British dominions.

I have tried to get that matter before this House. If there were no other reason for our interference in behalf of Ireland, we have it in the fact that to-day no American citizen is safe upon the soil of Great Britain or in Ireland. Instead of the name of an American citizen being, as it should be, a badge of honor, a guarantee of personal security, a terror to the enemies of free institutions everywhere, it is in Great Britain to-day treated with more indignity than that of the citizen or subject of any other country. Two or three days ago I received the information from an American citizen in Liverpool that, without any evidence to justify even a suspicion that he was implicated in any crime against the Government of Great Britain, he was arrested and dragged to jail, where, without even the form of trial, he was stripped of his citizen's clothes, dressed in the garb of a convict, and set to work to scrub the floors of the prison. If this is the treatment received by American citizens from the present governors of Ireland, may we not be pardoned for sympathizing with a movement which promises better treatment to our citizens under better rulers?

Mr. Speaker, I am admonished that there are but two or three minutes more which we can spend for taking the vote on this subject, and should I prolong my remarks I may prevent, for to-day at least, the favorable action of the House upon this resolution, which I very much desire. I therefore close abruptly.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] three minutes.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, I do not of course intend in the meager time allotted me to make a speech upon the general question of the wrongs of Ireland and our relations to that country. I desire simply, in the first place, to suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs a verbal modification of the resolution. In its present form it expresses sympathy for the people of Ireland in their "efforts to maintain the independence of States." I would suggest that they are engaged in an effort, not to "maintain," but to establish "the independence of States."

They have not for years possessed such independence. I propose that the resolution be modified so as to read "in all their just efforts to acquire and maintain the independence of States."

I desire, in the second place, to remark that I hope this resolution will be passed, although it is not so strong in its language as I had hoped and expected it would be. On some future occasion I shall, if opportunity offer, take occasion in another form, and when asking a more effective kind of legislation, to say what I wish to say upon this subject. I only wish now to remark that, without inquiring into the character of the people concerned, without regard to the question with what political party they affiliate in this country, without reference to the probabilities of their success, it is, in my judgment, the privilege and the duty of this House to express sympathy for and encouragement to every people everywhere who are struggling against wrong and oppression, and seeking to acquire and maintain the rights which God intended every man should enjoy.

I wish to make only this additional remark: that it is a false idea in political philosophy that a nation or people must first be prepared for liberty by education or by mental elevation or by moral instruction before they exercise the right of self-government. Education, science, and religion have everywhere under the rule of despotism been the patrons of and servants to the ruling classes and despotic power. Man's first and greatest right is liberty and self-government; and only in the exercise of this liberty as an educator can he foster those attributes, the exercise of which is essential to his well-being.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, it is the principle of monarchical Governments that once being States their continued existence as such must be recognized. That is the universal principle on which such Governments are administered. We claim the same for republican Governments. Ireland had once a Government of her own. That Government has been displaced by the English Government. If they are contending against the English rule they are contending to maintain the principle of the independence of States, and therefore I cannot accept the modification proposed by the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move the following amendment:

Resolved further, That in sympathizing with the people of Ireland we deem it proper to declare our belief that the present Fenian movement must prove entirely abortive in bringing relief to that country, and that any encouragement to that movement by resolution, unaccompanied by force, can only result in involving brave, enthusiastic, and patriotic Irishmen in difficulties from which their brethren are powerless to extricate them.

Mr. BANKS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BANKS. I am entitled to an hour to close the debate. In reference to the amendment I have only to say this: it was considered in committee, and it was not deemed advisable to present it to the House. There is no attempt on the part of the resolution of the committee to indorse that movement, nor did we think it necessary to condemn it on the ground that it may not be successful. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the amendment is virtually a nullification of the resolution itself. The country well knows as the House knows that the present agitation in Ireland looks to the establishment of free government in that island as the result of this same Fenian movement. We all know it is this Fenian movement that has effected military organization in Ireland, and that every rebel in arms in Ireland and all the preparatory arrangements looking to the establishment of an independent government in Ireland have been promoted, if not originally prompted, by this Fenian movement.

It may be true that it will cost lives, ay, of hundreds and thousands of men in the prosecution of the Fenian movement. All revolutions cost blood before they become successful. In our own revolutionary war oceans of blood were spilled before we were able to establish our independence of the mother country. Therefore, when we say by this resolution we sympathize with the people of Ireland in their present struggle, we say well and properly, but when we succeed it by saying that we are against the Fenian movement we nullify the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the amendment submitted to the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs will not be adopted. I look upon it as does the gentleman from New York, as an evasion or nullification of the original resolution. It seems to me that it is idle for us to express sympathy with the cause of Ireland and at the same time deprecate every measure which the people of Ireland take for their alleviation. It is worse than mockery to tell them in their degradation and suffering that we sympathize with them, and yet advise against every effort they make to throw off the oppression which weighs upon them.

It is not for me to determine at the outset, and I desire not to do it, that the effort they are making through the Fenian organization may not result to their good. Ireland's nationality is a cause worthy of Irishmen. What shall be done to achieve it is for them to judge. Submission and inaction will certainly not save them. If they will as a nation be free, they must strike the blow themselves; they must wrench their freedom from their oppressors by their own strong arms. It may seem a desperate struggle, but who can say that the liberties of that brave and generous people are not worth all their efforts. Who of us can determine what may or may not be accomplished. If their cause be just and our sympathies with them, in the name of God, in the name of liberty, let us not disparage any effort or discourage any enterprise which to them may betoken success. Any blow which the oppressed may aim at the oppressor to regain his rights and liberty has my heart's best prayer for its success.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 102, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Blair, Broomall, Farnsworth, Finney, Morrell, Noell, Peters, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Windom—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Denison, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Ela, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Hamilton, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Asabel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Kootz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercour, Miller, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pile, Plants, Polsey, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twitwell, Upson, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—102.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Brownell, Burr, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Covode, Dawes, Dodge, Eggleston, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Halsey, Harding, Hayes, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Nicholson, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Thomas, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and James F. Wilson—52.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution, and it was adopted.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be allowed a clerk for the Fortieth Congress when in session, at the same rate of compensation paid for similar service during the last session.

CAPITOL WATCHMEN.

The SPEAKER. The bill which passed the House authorizing the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes, and sent to the Senate has been enrolled without the second section in relation to preserving the Capitol from defacement. If there is no objection it will be returned in order to be properly engrossed.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

HENRY A. SMYTHE.

Mr. HULBURD. I am directed by the majority of the Committee on Public Expenditures to submit the following report and ask for its immediate consideration:

Whereas Congress having determined to adjourn, there is not sufficient time prior thereto for the Committee on Public Expenditures to conclude its investigation of the administration of the New York custom-house by Henry A. Smythe in the manner indicated by the House, although the committee, having given to Mr. Smythe two hearings, he has expressed himself content therewith unless the committee desires to prosecute the investigation further; and whereas in the opinion of the committee there is abundant affirmative testimony in the possession of the House of Henry A. Smythe's unfitness to hold the office of collector: Therefore,

Resolved, It is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythe should be removed from the office of collector of the port of New York, and that a copy of this resolution and the testimony be transmitted to the President of the United States.

Mr. HULBURD. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HULBURD. After the previous question is seconded I will hear the gentleman.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 53, noes 19; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. HULBURD and CHANLER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 24.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HULBURD. I will now hear the question of my colleague.

Mr. CHANLER. I merely wished first to know what my colleague intended to do; whether he intended to put this resolution through before the testimony has been read. After he has stated his case I will ask him to yield to me such time as may be necessary.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that there is an error of statement in the preamble? It recites that Congress has determined to adjourn. I understand there is no conclusion reached on that resolution by the two Houses.

Mr. HULBURD. I have no objection to amending by inserting the words "about to adjourn."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is not the fact; it is only a pretext for offering this resolution at this time. It is a false pretense.

The SPEAKER. As there has been some suggestion in regard to the two Houses disagreeing in regard to the time of adjournment, and the possible exercise of a certain privilege in that event by another branch of the Government, the Chair decides that the two Houses have agreed upon the time of adjournment. Both Houses have agreed to adjourn on Thursday. It is therefore an agreement as to the time when the two Houses will adjourn. The other part of the resolution in regard to the time to which Congress shall adjourn may be agreed upon hereafter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Do I understand the Chair to say that the two Houses have decided to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The Constitution says that when the two Houses disagree as to the time of adjournment the President may prorogue them. The Chair states, in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the two Houses have agreed to adjourn, the only difference between them being as to the time to which they will adjourn. Both branches have agreed to adjourn on Thursday at noon.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the Chair if he would feel authorized, without any further action upon this resolution for adjournment, to adjourn the House to-morrow at noon?

The SPEAKER. He would not, because there are certain things connected with the matter of adjournment upon which the two Houses have not agreed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire if the resolution of adjournment is yet beyond the control of either House? If a committee of conference should be appointed upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, may they not even now change the time fixed for adjournment?

The SPEAKER. Committees of conference have very large powers; they may recommend amendments or qualifications in many respects. But the Chair will decide those points when they arise. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] made such a positive assertion that the two Houses had not agreed to adjourn, the Chair expressed the opinion that they had agreed upon the time to adjourn, and that he should so rule when the question was raised.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The positiveness of my statement was more from my manner than from what I said. I meant only to express an opinion.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HULBURD.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York having resumed his seat and surrendered the floor, no debate is now in order except by unanimous consent, the call for the previous question having been sustained.

Mr. CHANLER. Before the previous question was called my colleague [Mr. HULBURD] informed me that after the previous question was seconded he would yield to me.

Mr. HULBURD. I did yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to have this resolution explained.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I object to debate.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not want to debate the resolution; I only want to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the recital in the preamble of the resolution is utterly wrong where it says that Congress has agreed to adjourn.

Mr. HULBURD. The Speaker has overruled that point; I have no objection to varying the statement.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise for information, as our position in regard to adjournment is alluded to in this preamble. The Senate have proposed to the House to adjourn to-morrow without conditions. The House have refused to do that, but they have agreed to adjourn to-morrow with certain conditions. That matter is now in negotiation between the two Houses, so that really nothing has been determined about the adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Whether the statement in this preamble be correct or not is a matter for the House and not for the Speaker to determine.

Mr. CHANLER. I would inquire whether after the explanation of the Chair, if the House votes in favor of the statement contained in the preamble of this resolution, it does not decide that the time of adjournment is fixed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided nothing in regard to this resolution. But the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] by his manner at least, stated so positively the fact that no adjournment had been agreed upon that the Chair, differing from him, thought it proper to make the statement to the House which he did. The Chair has decided nothing in regard to this resolution.

The question was upon the adoption of the preamble and the resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for a division of the question, and that the vote be taken upon the preamble separately.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken upon agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 40, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Mr. NOELL. I call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it in order now to move to lay this resolution and preamble on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I make that motion. I believe Mr. Smythe ought to be removed, but I do not think this is the right way to do it.

Mr. TABER. Is it in order to move now to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. It is, the House not having yet proceeded to execute that order.

Mr. TABER. Then I make that motion.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 42, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROOMALL and Mr. TABER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 39, noes 56.

So the vote ordering the main question was not reconsidered.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. SCHENCK, to lay the resolution upon the table; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 41, noes 49.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GLOSSBRENNER and Mr. SCOFIELD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 35, noes 50.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 37, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Calk, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Elia, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Hunter, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Logan, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Plants, Polsley, Robertson, Seofield, Shanks, Spalding, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Benjamin, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Cornell, Denison, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Halsey, Hull, Holman, Kerr, Leann, Mallory, Marshall, Morrissey, Munger, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Thaddeus Stevens, Taber, Van Aukon, Van Trump, Thomas Williams, and Wood—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Banks, Beaman, Blaine, Brownell, Burr, Butler, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Dawes, Dodge, Briggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Harding, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Newcomb, Pike, Pile, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Thomas, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, William Williams, and James F. Wilson—59.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HULBURD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. HULBURD. I move that the preamble be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced the return by the Senate of the bill (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, for the correction of the engrossment.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made, and the bill will be returned to the Senate.

RETIRING OF TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I yesterday made an unsuccessful attempt to get an expression of the sense of the House upon a joint resolution relative to the retiring of Treasury notes. I desire now to present that resolution again, and say a single word in explanation of it.

Several MEMBERS. Let the resolution be read.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, provides that of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued under the act of Congress of June 20, 1864, including the $50,000,000 authorized to be issued for temporary loans, not more than $4,000,000 shall be retired in any one month.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to suspend the rules to permit the introduction of the resolution.

On the motion there were—ayes 50, noes 33.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

DUTY ON WOOLEN GOODS.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, provides that the act of March 2, 1867, be amended by striking out in the paragraph commencing with the words "on webbing, beltings, bindings, braids" the words "unmixed with silk."

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was put; and the Speaker stated that two thirds appeared not to have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. KELLEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELLEY and BARNES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 10.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended; and the resolution was introduced and read a first and second time.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the passage of this joint resolution arises from the change in the relative rates of duty upon silk and wool. Hitherto all duties upon silk fabrics have been higher than those upon wool; and fabrics made partly of silk paid the silk duties. In framing the recent bill, known as the "Bingham bill," the clause of the former law prohibiting woollen fabrics mixed with silk from coming in at the same rate as woollen fabrics (that rate being then lower) was overlooked, and hence not changed; so that in this respect the old law still operates, and woollen fabrics mixed with a single thread of silk come in at a lower duty than articles manufactured entirely of wool. Thus the duty on articles like this which I hold in my hand, with a single thread of silk in them, is fifty per cent., which is less than if they were all wool. Articles made partly of old silk dresses are admitted under silk duty and not under wool duty.

I have a variety of specimens sent to me from New Jersey, showing the fraud which is perpetrated under that bill. My proposition is merely to prevent this fraud on the revenue, and to remedy a defect which occurred through oversight. If no gentleman wishes to ask a question I will call for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. With the gentleman's permission I will say that there are other defects in the law passed by Congress and approved March 2, 1867. There is not only the defect to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers, but there are other and perhaps more serious defects; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right in his attempt to remedy this defect, I do not see why he should not correct other defects in the same paragraph, even if he should not be disposed to enter into a general correction of the whole law? I ask him to look at others in the bill and to note the dangers of hasty legislation. Here we are undoing in one item that which we did only on the 2d of March last.

If he is right in making this correction, there is another one which ought also to be made in the same paragraph. It is provided that the duty on "cords and tassels" and on—

"Buttons or barrel buttons, or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, wrought by hand or braided by machinery, made of wool, worsted, or mohair, or of which wool, worsted, or mohair is a component material, unmixed with silk, fifty cents per pound."

Fifty cents per pound on these articles when every man knows that the forms of these tassels and buttons are sometimes made of wood and sometimes of bone. Let me suggest to the gentleman when he is putting one thing right that he ought not to forget this defect of the law in reference to cords, buttons, and tassels.

And while the gentleman has begun the work of correcting the law, I ask him to go still further and correct errors which must lead to infinite trouble to the custom-house. The gold cost per yard of overcoatings for the use of the poor is $1 08, while that for the use of the rich is $2 40. Now, the duty on overcoatings for the poor is one hundred and twenty while that on the rich is only sixty-five per cent. This was equally an oversight. It is one of a great many others. If any be corrected this ought to be corrected.

The Secretary of the Treasury is requested to collect samples of all the wools in the world before he levies any duty. He has not paid the least attention to the law. He cannot do it. He dodges it. He cannot get samples of llama, merino, alpaca, or any other of the two hundred varieties of wool. He is levying duties on open invoices. The duty is collected, open to any correction hereafter.

Mr. KELLEY. While I desire to amend almost everything to which the gentleman has referred, still I cannot hope to do it at this time. My only object is to close the door to a great fraud on our revenue which is closing some of the workshops of New York and Philadelphia, as well as of other parts of the country.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What will be the effect of repealing that whole law on this particular item?

Mr. KELLEY. The effect of repealing the whole law would be that then they would pay silk duties instead of woollen duties.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. This system of fragmentary legislation seems to have gone on at this, as well as the last session, to a terrible degree. While one part of the country has one article protected, another has another article protected, and so we go on. If any gentleman will bring in a proposition I am willing to repeal everything we have done here at this session in regard to the tariff. I think if there is anything pernicious it is this fragmentary legislation. First, it was on wool and woollens, and then on one thing and another, until we have had half a dozen items singled out from the rest. I wish some one would move for a repeal of them all.

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot yield for general discussion. I call the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLEY. A question for information.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to know something of the effect of this bill before I am called upon to vote upon it. It is a proposition, I believe, to change the law in a single particular; in regard to a certain class of woolen articles mixed with silk. I desire to know what the price per pound of these articles will be—the average value.

Mr. KELLEY. I would gladly give the information which the gentleman desires, but I cannot. It would take hours to obtain it even if we were in the neighborhood of the establishments.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to call attention to the fact that these articles when manufactured with silk pay a duty, as I understand, under the existing law of fifty per cent. ad valorem, and this of course does not alter that provision of the law. But as I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania the present duty upon these articles when made of wool with a single thread of silk is different from that.

Mr. KELLEY. They pay the duty laid on all other woolen goods. I would say to the gentleman that this resolution comes to me from the members of the Finance Committee of the Senate, who have considered the subject, and it would have come to us as a Senate resolution but for the fact that a measure in regard to the tariff cannot originate in that branch. The question has been investigated, however, by that committee, and it is found, as I have stated, that the insertion in one of the articles of a quantity of silk, so minute that it requires a glass to detect it, modifies the rate of duty while it does not change the value of the article. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPUTY CLERKS OF COURTS.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a joint resolution authorizing the clerks of the district and circuit courts for the State of New York to appoint deputy clerks.

No objection being made, the resolution was read a first and second time, and considered.

It authorizes each clerk of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the several districts in the State of New York to appoint a deputy, who may exercise all the official powers of his principal. Such deputy before he enters on the discharge of his duty to take the official oath now prescribed by law, but not to be entitled to any compensation for such services from the Government; nothing herein contained to be held to excuse or release said clerks from legal responsibility for acts performed in their behalf by their respective deputies.

Mr. POLAND. Will the gentleman yield? I desire to amend by striking out the State of New York and making the provision general, to apply to all the clerks of the courts in the country. I am aware there is a necessity for such a law.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The clerks of two courts in the State of New York have written to me urging this act. I have received no information on the subject from other sources. I have consulted with the members from my own State and they concur with me that this would be entirely proper. If the Representatives of the other States desire to embrace the circuit and district courts of the whole country, I certainly have no objection. I know the business of all these courts will be increased by the operation of the bankrupt law, and that it will be very necessary in the State that I have the honor in part to represent to have such a law as I propose. But if the allowing of the amendment will have the effect to create opposition and thereby defeat this resolution, I should be very sorry for having admitted it, thereby depriving the State of New York of this necessary act.

Mr. POLAND. During the last session of Congress application was made to me by the clerks of the district and circuit courts in the State of Vermont asking for precisely this action to be taken by Congress in reference to that State. I apprehend there is just the same necessity in all parts of the country for a provision of this sort as there is in the State of New York. I think it a very wise provision, and that there can be no opposition to it from any quarter. I move to amend by striking out the words "State of New York" and inserting "United States," so that it will apply to all the judicial districts in the United States.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the joint resolution and pending amendment be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 48, noes 36.

So the motion to refer was agreed to.

DISMISSALS FROM THE ARMY, ETC.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask leave to submit a resolution for consideration at this time. I will say that it is recommended by a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, including the gentlemen, members of that committee, who sit on the other side of the House. It is a resolution calling upon the President for information which is deemed necessary by the committee. I ask that the resolution be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to this House, or to the Committee on the Judiciary during recess, as soon as may be, a full list of all officers dismissed the service with forfeiture of pay and allowances, or who are liable to other forfeitures or supposed forfeitures according to the regulations of the Army; and of all enlisted men who have forfeited pay, bounty, or allowances for desertion or absence without leave, or by sentence of courts-martial who have been restored to the rolls, or had such forfeitures in any way relieved by order of the President or other officer of the Government; which list shall show who have been so restored or relieved, and upon whose orders, and the amount of such forfeitures and fines which have been restored or may be released to the persons so restored and relieved by said orders, setting forth fully upon what representations and whose recommendations or approval such orders of restoration or relief have been made; so that the full amount taken from the Treasury, which had been forfeited by such orders, may be fully shown.

Mr. NIBLACK. I object.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. My colleagues upon the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] consent to this resolution. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. NIBLACK. It will take six months.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not know how long this will take; but the committee need the information.

Mr. NIBLACK. Very well; I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IRON-CLAD CAMANCHE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise for the purpose of asking the House to discharge the Committee of Claims from the further consideration of the Senate joint resolution No. 17, in relation to paying the contractors for constructing the iron-clad Camanche. If the House will permit me to make the statement, I will say that I make this request at the suggestion of Senators from the Pacific coast.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a question of order. That joint resolution was ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed, and the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was referred was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but at the same time a motion can be made to discharge the committee from its further consideration. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] or any other member objects, then it will require a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. WARD. I do object; I think it should be examined by a committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules, in order that the committee may be discharged from the further consideration of this joint resolution, and that it may be considered in the House at the present time.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 48, noes 40.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

INDIANA AND OHIO WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the rules be suspended in order to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time the bill of the Senate No. 105, to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion; and before the vote is taken upon my motion I ask that the bill may be read for the information of the House.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that immediately after the passage of this act the President shall appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who are not residents of the State of Indiana, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the amount of moneys expended by the State of Indiana in enrolling, equipping, subsisting, transporting, and paying such State forces as were called into service in said State since the 1st day of January, 1862, to act in concert with the forces of the United States in the suppression of the rebellion against the United States.

The second section provides that the commissioner so appointed shall proceed, subject to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, at once to examine all the items of expenditure made by the State for the purposes herein named, allowing only for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, equipping, subsisting, transporting, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Government at the request of the United States department commander commanding the district in which Indiana may at the time have been included, or by the express order, consent, or concurrence of such commander, or which may have been employed or used in suppressing rebellion in said State. No allowance is to be made for any troops who did not perform actual military service in full concert and coöperation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders.

It is provided in the third section that in making up the accounts the commissioners shall, for the convenience of the accounting officers of the Government, state separately the amounts expended respectively for enrolling, equipping, arming, subsisting, transporting, and paying the troops.

The fourth section directs that in the adjustment of accounts under this act the commissioners shall not allow for any expenditures or compensation for service at a rate greater than was at the time authorized by the laws of the United States and the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War in similar cases.

It is provided in the fifth section that so soon as the commissioners shall have made up the account and ascertained the balance they shall make written report, showing the different items of expenditure, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be examined by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, who are to audit the accounts as in ordinary cases; and if it should appear that any sum remains due to the State the Secretary of the Treasury is to draw his warrant for the sum, payable to the Governor of the State, and deliver it to him.

The sixth section provides that the commissioners shall, before proceeding to the discharge of their duties, be sworn that they will carefully examine the accounts existing between the United States and the State of Indiana, and that they will to the best of their ability make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof. For their services they are to receive such compensation as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding ten dollars per day for each commissioner.

The seventh section appropriates a sufficient sum to carry the act into effect.

In the eighth section the provisions of the act are extended in every respect to the State of Ohio. The same proceedings are to be had for determining the amount due that State; and a sufficient sum is appropriated to pay the amount when ascertained, under the limitations and restrictions of this act.

On the motion of Mr. HOLMAN to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 55, noes 33.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 37.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had non-concurred in the amendments of the House numbered one, two, three, and five to the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, and had concurred in the remaining amendments with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It is usual in the last hours of an expiring session to state the condition of business. The two Houses have concurred so far as to agree to an adjournment on Thursday at twelve o'clock m., but they have not yet agreed in reference to the time when Congress shall again meet.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Suppose there is no action on this resolution, does the Chair say, as it now stands, that the two Houses will adjourn to-morrow at twelve o'clock m.?

The SPEAKER. As yet there has been no conclusive action.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The Senate has gone into executive session, and not acted on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then there has been no conclusive action. As this parliamentary point seems to puzzle gentlemen of legal acumen, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair will explain. If there be a bill of thirteen sections, and the two Houses agree to twelve of them and do not agree to the thirteenth, the Speaker would not sign the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. If we adjourn now, I suppose we meet to-morrow as usual.

The SPEAKER. Of course, as there has been no conclusive action in reference to the adjournment.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The first business on the Speaker's table were amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 83, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867.

Mr. BROOKS. I reserve; until I hear the amendments, all points of order.

First amendment of the Senate:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House numbered two, with the following amendment: In line fifteen insert the following:

And provided further, That the rates fixed by previous laws shall not be hereby increased.

Mr. BROOKS. How will it then read?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to non-concur. The bill will have to go to a committee of conference.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I wish to inquire whether my colleague has any objection to concur in the amendment of the Senate?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. My proposition is to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. It strikes me we ought to concur in this amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. One strikes the other out.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I do not so understand it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. My proposition is to non-concur and have a committee of conference, unless there is any particular one on which gentlemen desire a separate vote. There are pretty large additions made to the bill by the Senate.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to know what these additions of the Senate are before I trust them to a committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the House as it is proposed to be amended by the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of section seven of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, as relates to the publication of the treaties and laws of the United States be, and the same is hereby, extended to the States not therein designated, and to the Territories; and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, upon receiving notice of the designation of newspapers under the act aforesaid and this section, promptly to furnish to such newspapers authentic copies of the treaties and laws of the United States to be published as aforesaid: Provided, It shall be lawful to print the laws and treaties of the United States as aforesaid in three newspapers in Louisiana: And provided further, The rates fixed by previous laws shall not be hereby increased.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

That the Senate agree to the amendment numbered four, with the following:

In line five of said amendment strike out "nine" and insert "twelve."

The clause will then read, as follows:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for salaries of the Commissioner of Education and his clerks, $12,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House concur.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

At the end of line five insert:

For the period of three months ending June 30, 1867, and for the year ending June 30, 1868.

The clause, as amended, reads, as follows:

Commissioner of Education and his clerks, for the period of three months ending June 30, 1867, and for the year ending June 30, 1868.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to concur.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the two votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

After line seven of said amendment insert:

For the repair of Long bridge, District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $15,000.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to non-concur.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the expenses incurred by certain Indian delegations in visiting Washington city, for the purpose of negotiating treaties, and in their return home, to wit: For the Sioux of Lake Traverse, $10,000. For the Sioux of the Upper Mississippi, $20,000. For the tribes residing in the State of Kansas, $15,000.

For the Chippewas of the Mississippi, $6,000. And all laws allowing the President, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to enter into treaties with any Indian tribes are hereby repealed, and no expense shall hereafter be incurred in negotiating a treaty with any Indian tribe until an appropriation authorizing such expense shall be first made by law.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move non-concurrence.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I hope it will be concurred in, and I will give my reasons.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think we had better allow this to go to the committee of conference. I move the previous question.

Mr. BURLEIGH. There is a little information on this subject that I would like to put the House in possession of.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable unless the previous question is withdrawn.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was non-concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Add the following as a new section: SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the several sums of money heretofore appropriated to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings be transferred to and may be expended under the direction of the chief Engineer of the Army or such officer of the Engineer corps as he may direct.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to concur.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate that have been non-concurred in, and ask for the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 112) to incorporate the Lincoln Monument Association; and

An act (S. No. 96) to establish a port of delivery at Chester, Pennsylvania.

ACCOUNTS OF LINE OFFICERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to joint resolution of the House No. 26, authorizing the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out the words "they shall make affidavit" in line five of page 1 of the joint resolution, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "said Auditor shall be satisfied by affidavit of such line officers, or otherwise."

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the joint resolution be read as it will stand if amended as proposed by the Senate.

The joint resolution as proposed to be amended was read at length. It provides that the Second Auditor shall audit and settle the accounts of line officers, to the extent of their pay for services as such officers, due them from the United States, in all cases where said Auditor shall be satisfied by affidavit of such line officers, or otherwise, of their inability to make their monthly report or returns by reason of their having been prisoners in the hands of the enemy, or where by any accident or casualty of war they have been unable to account for property in their possession.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment of the Senate proposes to change the joint resolution merely to allow the Auditor to be satisfied with the proof rendered, instead of requiring these officers to make affidavit.

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

PRINTING BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. LAFLIN. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed ten thousand extra copies of the bankrupt act for the use of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the use of the House ordering the printing of that act? It can be obtained anywhere throughout the country for five or ten cents a copy.

Mr. WARD. There is a great demand for it all over the country.

Mr. LAFLIN. The act is already printed; this resolution calls for the printing of extra copies. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL BILL.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am instructed by the same committee to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House two thousand extra copies of the bill providing for the survey of the Niagara ship-canal.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope not; do not let us print everything.

Mr. LAFLIN. I call the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes fifty-four, noes not counted.

So the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SPALDING asked and obtained leave of absence after to-morrow for the remainder of the session.

REPORT OF CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report of the Congressional Printer touching the purchase of paper, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to investigate the same, and with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. This subject has not been referred to the Committee on Printing, and they have no right to report upon anything which has not been referred to them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct; the report of the Government Printer has not yet been referred to the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has not the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] the right to introduce a resolution from the committee?

The SPEAKER. This resolution is not in the regular order of reports from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move to suspend the rules, in order that I may submit this resolution for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The House must first, by a majority vote, dispense with the further execution of the order to proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table before a motion to suspend the rules will be in order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division, there were—ayes 51, noes 40.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCOFIELD and Mr. ROBINSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 51, noes 39.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ALLISON: The petition of D. O. Preston and others, citizens of Howard county, Iowa, asking for an appropriation for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and for the opening up of continuous water communication from the Mississippi river to the eastern sea-board.

Also, the petition of Selden Candee and others, of Clayton county, Iowa, upon the same subject.

Also, the petition of R. W. Bullock and others, of Allamakee county, Iowa, upon the same subject.

Also, the petition of C. A. Dean and others, of Clayton county, Iowa, upon the same subject.

Also, the petition of James Conery and others, of Chickasaw county, upon the same subject.

Also, the petition of G. W. Nichols and others, of Winnesheik county, Iowa, upon the same subject.

Also, the petition of E. K. Morrill and others, of Chickasaw county, praying the establishment of a mail route, with tri-weekly service, from Bradford, in said county, to Busti, in Howard county.

By Mr. DONNELLY: A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, relative to the return of fees in certain cases of canceled homestead entries.

Also, two remonstrances from citizens of the State of Minnesota, against the removal of the United States land office from Taylor's Falls, in said State.

By Mr. KELLEY: A petition of the officers of the Peace Society of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to establish and maintain a more peaceful relation with the Indians, and by justice and kindness, to harmonize all proper interests, both of the white and red man; and in order to attain this end, they respectfully recommend, not only a policy of peace founded on justice, but an instrumentality of agents who, from love to God and man and freedom from covetousness, shall be qualified to carry out honestly and fairly with the Indians the really paternal spirit of the Government toward them.

By Mr. LAFLIN: The petition of Edward Learned, president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, praying for an investigation into the organization of said company.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio: The petition of R. Z. Wilson, J. C. K. Milligan, and Henry O'Neill, a committee of the Reformed Presbyterian church, asking Congress to take measures for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, so that God may be acknowledged as Supreme, so that Christ the Mediator may be acknowledged as "The Governor among the nations," and so that the Bible may be taken as the supreme law.

By Mr. WINDOM: A memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the Lake Pepin and Omaha railway, from the city of Wabasha, Minnesota, through Rochester, High Forest, Austin, and Albert Lea, Minnesota, and Fort Dodge, Iowa, to Omaha, Nebraska.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 28, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings will be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I think so near the close of the session as we are will justify the suspension of the reading of the Journal. I make that motion, if there be no objection. We all want the time.

There being no objection, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

CONDITION OF MARYLAND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received from a large delegation from the Republican convention of Maryland the resolutions of that convention with a request that they be laid before the Senate, and if there be no objection the resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

"Whereas the Legislature of Maryland has since the adjournment of this Republican State convention on the 27th of February passed the convention bill in regard to which this convention has already in previous resolutions declared its judgment, and this convention is now reassembled, as provided for by its final resolution on the contingency of the passage of said convention bill: Therefore

Resolved, That we return our thanks to the Republican members of the General Assembly for their memorial to Congress, presented to that body on the 25th of March, and this convention, in behalf of the majority of the people of Maryland, appeal hereby to the Congress of the United States to grant the request of that memorial.

Resolved, That we call upon Congress to protect the loyal majority of the people of Maryland, both white and colored, in defeating the scheme of the revolutionists in the Legislature, and to aid us in forming and to guaranty to us by acts of Congress a republican State government on the basis of impartial manhood suffrage.

Resolved, That we will oppose any new constitution set up in subversion of the existing constitution under the convention bill which does not express the will of the majority of the people, without regard to color; and that we will, with the aid of the loyal representatives of the nation, and by all means in our power, resist and destroy any such constitution as a revolutionary usurpation.

Resolved, That we will take no part in the approaching election for delegates to a constitutional convention further than to recommend a general vote of the Republicans of the State against the call for a convention, and to use every lawful means in their power to defeat the call.

Resolved, That should the call be sustained by a majority of the voters, that the State central committee, on ascertaining the result, issue a call for district meetings, to be held in every election district in the State, for the choice by ballot, on the basis of universal manhood suffrage, of delegates to a State constitutional convention, each county and the city of Baltimore to elect the number to which they may be entitled under the present constitution of the State.

Resolved, That said State constitutional convention, if called, shall assemble in the city of Baltimore on the first Wednesday in June, and proceed to form a constitution based on universal manhood suffrage.

Resolved, That courage, wisdom, and action are all that is necessary to success. And we call on the tried Union veterans of the State, who have been hardened by the conflicts of six years of battle and agitation, to fly high the banner of liberty and Union, and know no end but victory.

"A true copy: FREDERICK SCHLEY, Chairman Committee on Resolutions."

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that there is any particular request in these resolutions as to the measures which Congress should adopt to protect any of the citizens of Maryland from wrongs which are alleged to exist or which are stated to be apprehended. I am therefore not certain as to the committee to which they should be referred. I suppose, however, the proper reference is to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I propose to make that motion. Before doing so, however, I take the occasion to say that I agree in the opinion which one of the resolutions contains, that the convention which is provided for by the recent legislation of my State should not be called by her people. In the present condition of the country, and the excitement which it is producing, and the state of feeling in Maryland, I should deem such a convention not only unfortunate, but fraught with more or less of peril to the peace and prosperity of my State, and I shall endeavor, Mr. President, to impress this view upon my constituents and hope to succeed in it. I now make the motion that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOWLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee in favor of securing the quota of arms from the General Government to which that State may be entitled under law, and that one of the forts in the vicinity of Nashville may be secured for the depository of said arms; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee in favor of exempting that State from the payment of any direct or internal revenue tax for the years 1867 and 1868; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Lake Pepin and Omaha railway; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NYE presented a letter of Benjamin F. Small, of Carson City, Nevada, in relation to his claim against the Post Office Department, to accompany Senate joint resolution No. 45; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the memorial of Charles Louis Fleischmann, on the culture of forest trees on the plains, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 39, in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress. It is a resolution of but four lines, allowing the payment of their salary to be made to Senators and Representatives monthly. Some members of the other House feel a great interest in it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the Senator will not call that up for a few moments. I think it is necessary to amend it.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases.

The message further announced that the House insisted on its first amendment, and concurred in some and non-concurred in others of the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVEN of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM WINDOM of Minnesota, and Mr. CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE of Wisconsin, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 112) to incorporate the Lincoln Monument Association, and the enrolled bill (S. No. 96) to establish a port of delivery at Chester, Pennsylvania; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HOUSE RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 453) concerning the payment of claims made by foreign Governments against the United States for property destroyed by the armies of the United States, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) respecting the proposed confederation of Provinces on the northern frontier of the United States, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT OF WOOL TARIFF LAW.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue upon imported wool, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

Mr. CATTELL. I trust that the resolution will be put upon its passage without a reference. It is exceedingly simple, and is perfectly well understood. It merely repeals three words in the Bingham act, which were there by an error. It is approved by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who understands this question well, and I should be very glad to have it considered now with the consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must object for the present. I will withdraw my objection when my colleague comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: I objected just now to the present consideration of the resolution which my friend from New Jersey desired to have acted upon, having misunderstood what he said respecting my colleague's views on the subject. Understanding that it is satisfactory to my colleague, I withdraw the objection that I made, and hope that the resolution may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the joint resolution will be considered as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. It proposes to amend the act of March 2, 1867, by striking out in the paragraph commencing with the words "On webbings, beltings, bindings, braids," the words "unmixed with silk."

Mr. SHERMAN. Has that been referred?

Mr. CATTELL. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me one moment I will explain. These words, "unmixed with silk," were retained in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather defer action on it until Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, comes in.

Mr. CATTELL. I will only say that the resolution itself was drawn by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in his own words, submitted to the House, and passed there. It meets his entire approbation, and I should like to have it considered at once on account of the lateness of the session. It simply provides against frauds upon the revenue by bringing in worsted goods mixed with silk, with a single line or two of silk in them, below the actual tariff upon woolen goods alone. It is simply to prevent frauds upon the revenue. It is approved by Mr. MORRILL, passed the House by an almost unanimous vote yesterday, and it is in every respect important that it should pass at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that this is an amendment that we made in the new tariff, which failed to pass, with reference to that very thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wished to have it understood.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMEROY afterward said: I move to reconsider the vote by which House joint resolution No. 47 was passed. I desire to offer an amendment to it. I was not in my seat at the moment it was under consideration, or I should have moved it then.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will not interfere with that resolution. If the Senator moves an amendment it will have to be referred. A single objection will send it to a committee. It was with extreme reluctance that I agreed to let the resolution itself pass, and it was only because the matter had been thoroughly examined in committee at the last session.

Mr. POMEROY. It has been suggested to me by several Senators to move the amendment that I desire to offer, and then it can be sent to the House for concurrence.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would probably make a reference necessary.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the resolution as it stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will defeat the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I know there is no objection to my amendment, and I do not think it will endanger the resolution. If Senators desire to have the resolution stand as it is, I would not endanger its passage by any amendment. Does the Senator from Ohio object to it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not object, but I think it had better be let alone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reconsideration of the vote on the passage of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I now move to reconsider the vote ordering the resolution to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I now offer as an amendment to the resolution the bill that I introduced yesterday morning, as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, to amend section five of an act entitled "An act to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, shall not be construed to apply to lasting, mohair cloth, silk twist, or other manufactures of cloth woven or made in patterns of such size, shape, and form, or cut in such manner as to be fit for buttons exclusively.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to know whether that subject has been considered by any committee or not.

Mr. POMEROY. It has been fully considered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say to my friend from Oregon that this will leave the duty upon the material used for the covering of buttons as it has been for the last twenty years. That is all there is of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

DREDGE-BOATS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I understand that the gentleman who reported the resolution has an amendment that he proposes to offer to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "present" before the word "appropriation" in the eighth line, and inserting at the end of the resolution the following words:

Provided for in the act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1867.

So that the resolution will read:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized, on the recommendation of the engineer department, to build and operate two dredge-boats for the purpose of deepening and keeping open the channel of one or more of the passes at the mouth of the Mississippi, and to expend for that purpose so much as may be necessary of the appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi river provided for in the act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1867.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

SHIP-CANAL AROUND THE FALLS OF THE OHIO.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and I ask that it be acted upon now. It will lead to no debate, and take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? If there be no objection it will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask what is the necessity for it, and what particular falls of the Ohio river are meant?

Mr. CHANDLER. This is simply ordering a survey from appropriations already made. It does not appropriate a dollar. It is the falls of the Ohio.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where?

Mr. CHANDLER. Below Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There has already been one canal built around there which the Government used to own stock in, but which it finally gave up entirely to the stockholders. This proposes another one.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is around the same falls. It is simply ordering a survey from an appropriation already made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. An appropriation for what?

Mr. CHANDLER. The appropriation for western rivers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then what is the necessity for this?

Mr. CHANDLER. The works that are to be surveyed are defined in the bill for river and harbor improvements. This is a different work to be surveyed, but it requires no additional appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear it read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause surveys, with plans and estimates of cost, to be made by an officer of engineers, for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river on the Indiana side thereof, of suitable location and dimensions for military, naval, and commercial purposes; and also to cause said officer to estimate the expense of completing the Louisville and Portland canal, on the Kentucky side of said falls, according to the plan on which the said canal company is now progressing with said work, and that the expenses of both be defrayed from the sums appropriated in the acts of June 23, 1866, and March 2, 1867, for examination and surveys relating to the improvement of harbors and rivers on the northwestern lakes.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee what possible object there can be in having two canals around the same falls, one on each side?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not very conversant with this matter. The member from Cincinnati, and likewise the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS], told me that the canal already in use was not large enough. At any rate they desire a survey, and the House have passed this resolution; and the Committee on Commerce authorized me, as it appropriated no money, to report it for the gratification of those parties. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. HOWE. Let me make one remark. The Senator says it appropriates no money; but substantially it does, since it diverts a portion of a fund already dedicated by act of Congress to important works. It diverts a part of that fund and dedicates it to this work, for which it seems to me there can be no possible necessity. I hope that the joint resolution will lie upon the table, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF TROOPS TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution which was pending last evening when we adjourned. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has given it attention, and it will not occupy more than a moment. I move that it be considered now, in order that it may go to the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 53) relating to the transportation of troops by the Isthmus route to the Pacific States and Territories. It provides that hereafter whenever it shall be necessary to transport troops to the Pacific States or Territories, or to bring troops therefrom, the Secretary of War shall, for one week or more before ordering the same to be done, advertise in at least one newspaper at New York or at San Francisco, as the case may be, for proposals for such transportation, and that he shall contract with such person or persons as shall give sufficient security for the most rapid and safe conveyance of such troops at the lowest cost to the Government; but he shall be at liberty to reject all bids if he shall believe that the public interests will be promoted thereby.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFIRMATION OF DIRECT TAX SALES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 79) to confirm certain sales made by the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina to persons in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, and for other purposes, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration. I will state to the Senate that the bill was prepared at the Treasury Department. The object of it is this: by a statute passed in 1862 the commissioner of direct taxes was authorized to sell lands and to take one fourth in payment, and the remaining three fourths were to be paid in three years—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question had better be put on taking it up for consideration before it is explained. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. I object. I have forgotten all about it. If it can be postponed for a moment I will look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made it lies over under the rule.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the adjournment resolution, which was returned from the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member permit me to waive an objection which I made just now to a bill reported by the Judiciary Committee? We can pass it in a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us get this resolution up first.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The motion of Mr. TRUMBULL was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the interposition of any motion that does not take any time. I believe my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] wishes to introduce a bill.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A bill (S. No. 117) for the relief of Charles E. Guerie;

A bill (S. No. 118) for the relief of Seth E. Ward; and

A bill (S. No. 119) for the relief of B. B. Mills.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 54) in favor of Joseph Segar, of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONFIRMATION OF DIRECT TAX SALES.

Mr. JOHNSON. There was a bill reported from the Judiciary Committee by the honorable member from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] a few moments ago. I was not exactly aware at the time of the nature of the bill, it not having been seen by me in committee; but from his explanation of it I am satisfied that the bill ought to pass, and pass at once. I therefore waive my objection, and hope that the bill may be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland withdraws his objection; and if there be no further objection, that bill will be considered as before the Senate, and will be read.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 79) to confirm certain sales by the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina to persons in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps, and for other purposes. The preamble recites that by the provisions of the eleventh section of an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1862, and in accordance with instructions issued by the President on the 16th of September, 1863, certain lands in the parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke, South Carolina, which had been bid in by the United States at public tax sales, were in part sold by the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina to persons serving in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps, on the following conditions: that one fourth part of the purchase money should be paid at the time of sale, and the residue in three years thereafter, and that the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, should commit no waste before payment in full of the purchase money, and that upon failure to comply with either of these conditions it should be lawful for the commissioners or their successors in office to enter upon the premises so sold and sell them for the payment of the purchase money due the United States, returning the overplus, if any, to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns. The bill, therefore, proposes to confirm the sales made to persons in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps as provided in the eleventh section of the act of June 7, 1862, and under the instructions of the President to the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina, upon the terms and conditions set forth in those instructions; and the commissioners, or their successors in office, are authorized, on such terms and conditions as they, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to resell at public sale, after giving due notice as upon the sale of other public lands of the United States for sixty days, such of the tracts or parcels of land as may have been sold to persons who have failed to comply with any of the conditions of sale prescribed by those instructions, and they are authorized to make one bid on any tract offered at such resale for and in behalf of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have an explanation of the bill. I am a little fearful about its passage. It seems to me that we ought at least to give six months' notice to these persons.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Sixty days is the time mentioned in the bill.

Mr. WILSON. That is a very short time in a large country like ours. I think six months is little enough. I hope the bill will be modified so as to provide for the sale of the lands after six months' notice, giving them that period to look about themselves. I have been written to in regard to these lands by some of the soldiers. It has been pretty difficult for them to comply with the terms of sale, and they want a little more time in which to do it. I think we ought to give them six months at least.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This matter has been pressed upon me by the Treasury Department. These lands were sold for taxes, and by the terms of the law under which they were sold one fourth of the purchase money was to be paid in cash and three fourths in three years. The purchasers have failed to comply with the payment of the three fourths, and there is no power resting in the Government to make a resale. The notice has to be, by the law there, sixty days. I have no objection to making it longer; but I think six months is almost too long. I suggest four months.

Mr. WILSON. I am very sure that some of the men who have purchased this land find it very difficult to pay for it, and would like to have the time of payment extended for a longer period than three years. I think if the Senator would consent to modify the bill so as to give them six months after the passage of this act within which to pay the money it would help them very much.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I accept that amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I move, then, to strike out sixty days and insert six months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATE CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, the Senate proceeded to consider the first amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, disagreed to by the Senate, and the amendments of the Senate to the other amendments of the House to the bill, disagreed to by the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. BUCKALEW the conferees on the part of the Senate.

JOHN PERRY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of John Perry, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the provisions of the act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, approved June 6, 1866, shall apply to John Perry, of Illinois, a pensioner by virtue of a special act approved March 3, 1859.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall now proceed with the question of adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The action of the House will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 27, 1867.

Resolved, That the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House in relation to the adjournment of the two Houses with the following amendment:

Strike out all of the Senate amendment from and after the word "that" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Senate and House of Representatives do hereby each give consent to the other that each House of Congress shall adjourn its present session from the hour of twelve m. on Thursday, the 28th day of March, instant, to assemble again on the first Wednesday of June and the first Wednesday of September of this year, unless the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall by joint proclamation, to be issued by them ten days before either of the times herein fixed for assembling, declare that there is no occasion for the meeting of Congress at such time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment so that it will read according to the amendment that I send to the Chair. It is to strike out all after the word "that" in the first line of the amendment and insert:

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby instructed to adjourn their respective Houses at noon on the 29th day of March, instant, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867; and that, unless otherwise ordered by both Houses, they, at one o'clock in the afternoon of the next day thereafter, further adjourn their respective Houses to the first Wednesday of November, 1867.

Of course it is well known to the Senate that I have voted against having any of these intermediate midsummer sessions, and have been in favor of meeting on the 1st of November or the latter part of October for the regular purposes of business; and it is also well understood that the Senate have heretofore, by a pretty strong majority, disagreed also to this early meeting or repeated meetings of the two Houses; but it is equally obvious now that the other branch of Congress is determined to have at least two intermediate meetings in some form. I think it right, therefore, to compromise this difference on a mere question of expediency and safety by providing for one which in effect is contingent. The only change is as to the method of getting at it, so as to bring it within our constitutional powers; so as to compromise the difference of opinion which exists between the two bodies; and in that view I should hope that the Senate would concur in the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is only important as a precedent, it seems to me. We have wasted a good deal of time on this question of adjournment. I do not regard it as very important. A large majority of the Senate have expressed their opinion that there is no necessity in the state of the public business to demand extraordinary sessions of Congress; that neither the President nor anybody else has sufficient power to endanger the public safety during the usual recess. That is my deliberate judgment; and I think now that the country would have more confidence in us, and that we should have sufficient confidence in the condition of things to go home, taking the usual adjournment, and meeting here at the usual time. But as there is no very serious objection to any precaution against contingencies that we cannot foresee, I am not disposed to make any active opposition to any reasonable measure to convene Congress in the event of any such exigency. The House of Representatives have, by repeated votes, declared that they think it is necessary to provide for an exigency not now foreseen, either on account of events which may occur, or on account of power that may be exercised by other departments of the Government. If they entertain that fear I do not object to their guarding against it. The only question with me is as to the best mode and method of doing it. The plan which we agree upon will probably be looked upon as a precedent hereafter, if a like condition of things should ever recur.

It seems to me perfectly plain that we can authorize the Presiding Officers of the two Houses to convene Congress together; and if there is no constitutional doubt about it, that, it seems to me, is the best way. We fear now the exercise of power by the Executive. We therefore propose to provide some plan by which Congress may be convened to meet unforeseen exigencies. The President has the power to convene us, but we do not choose to trust him. I have no doubt that under the Constitution Congress has the power to delegate to the Presiding Officers of the two bodies the designation of the time and mode and manner of our meeting. If there is anything conferred by the Constitution upon Congress it is the right to perpetuate its existence during the entire term of the election of Congress. We can prescribe the time and place and mode and manner of meeting. We cannot be prorogued; we cannot be dissolved; and herein Congress differs from all other legislative bodies that I have read of in modern history. The British Parliament may be prorogued; the French Chamber of Deputies may be prorogued; I believe every legislative body now existing in Europe may be dissolved by the executive authority; but under the Constitution of the United States Congress is an independent power, and may keep itself in existence in spite of the Executive. The Executive has no power over it except in the single case of disagreement between the two Houses as to the time of adjournment, when he may fix the time. He has no control over their meetings. The power is given to Congress to assemble at their own time and at their own place. The Constitution provides that they shall assemble once a year, and that they shall assemble on the first Monday of December, unless a different time is fixed. The fourth clause of the fifth section of the first article provides that—

"Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days."

That implies necessarily that with the consent of the House it may adjourn at any time, in any mode, for five days or ten days or fifty days, provided, however, they meet once a year. Now, to say that we cannot delegate this power is a departure from other principles that we have acted upon. For instance, looking over the designated powers of Congress, it is provided that Congress shall have power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." Does that mean that Congress shall go into the market to negotiate that money? Not at all. It simply means that Congress shall by law provide the mode and manner in which money shall be borrowed; and we therefore commonly authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow money upon the credit of the United States, prescribing the terms and manner. Money so borrowed is borrowed by Congress. So the same language is used in regard to the power to coin money. Congress may coin money. Do we coin money? We authorize the coining of money at the Mint. And so all the powers that are given to Congress in the long list of powers are practically delegated to some executive officer.

It seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent us from delegating to the Presiding Officers of the two Houses the right to designate the time when we shall meet. I can draw no nice distinctions of that kind; and I think that the best form. We can trust the Presiding Officers of the two Houses to designate the time. We can adjourn to meet at a time designated by them, provided it is within the year, leaving the regular session to stand. Therefore, when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] offered his proposition the other day, it seemed to me a reasonable one, and I voted for it. I did not wish to take part in the discussion, or rather I did not want to occupy time. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] seemed strongly impressed with the idea that it was unconstitutional. I shall not now consume time, but barely repeat my opinion that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent us from adopting that form, and I am in favor of it; and if the proposition is offered by the Senator from Massachusetts I shall now vote for it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have but one idea to express in answer to the Senator from Ohio. The President, the head of the executive department, has the power to convene Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not exclusive at all.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Here it is proposed by a legislative statute to confer that power upon the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Why, sir, that power being vested in the Executive, is in its nature exclusive. If it could by statute be vested in any other officer of the Government, or in any other power, the provision of the Constitution vesting it in him would be perfectly nugatory; it could be defeated at any time by a majority of the two Houses of Congress acting in concert or by a statute which they might enact.

This contains the whole argument, and it is useless to go into collateral considerations. If the power be an executive power, declared to be such by the Constitution of the United States, it is impossible by legislation to create it a statute power and to vest it anywhere whatever. If the power exist to do this by statute it may be vested in any other officer as well as the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House; it may be conferred upon a commission; it may be conferred upon the head of the judicial department, that is, upon the Chief Justice of the United States; it may be conferred upon any person whatever, official or citizen. Such being the results to which the argument of the Senator from Ohio tends, it must be unfounded. This power was regulated by the Constitution, and therefore it cannot be regulated by statute. That is the answer which I think any reasonable man ought to give to the suggestion to which we have listened.

Mr. SHERMAN. The whole argument is based upon the idea that the power given to the President to convene Congress upon extraordinary occasions is an exclusive power. There is no ground for such an argument.

The language of the Constitution conferring this power on the President is—

"He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper."

This proposition does not interfere with his constitutional power. If he deems, from any condition of affairs, that an extraordinary occasion has arisen, he has the power, notwithstanding our action here, to convene us, even at a time when the Presiding Officers would not wish us to assemble. This does not interfere with his power. It is not in the nature of an exclusive power; but, on the contrary, the Constitution itself confers upon Congress absolute power over this question. We may adjourn from day to day, for three days at a time, or for six days at a time, by the consent of both Houses, or we may continue en permanence, as we should do on an extraordinary occasion.

The truth is that the Constitution is based upon the idea that there are three distinct powers of the Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, and the executive has no power whatever to limit, curb, restrain, or affect in the slightest degree the legislative power of the Government except so far as the veto is concerned, which is only a part of the legislative power. Congress has absolute power over its time of meeting and its time of adjournment, the mode and manner of meeting, the place of meeting, and all the circumstances connected with it. This additional power is given to the President merely to provide for an exigency that may arise during the recess unforeseen, when he may convene us; but it seems to me it does not prevent Congress, in the exercise of its clear power over the subject, from providing that it will meet on the call of the Presiding Officers of the two Houses. No difficulty could arise from it. If you, sir, and the Speaker of the House, could by proclamation call Congress together, and a quorum of both Houses should meet here on your call, who could dispute the authority of the Congress thus assembled? Would the President dare do it? It would be the Congress of the United States, serving within the time for which it was elected by the people and the States. Nobody could interfere with its authority when convened in pursuance of its own law prescribed by itself. Neither the Executive nor the judiciary could interfere with its power. No one can call in question the right of Congress to fix the mode and manner and time and place of meeting. It seems to me, therefore, the argument based upon this clause of the Constitution is unsound, because it goes upon the supposition that this power of the President is exclusive in its character when it is not exclusive, the same power being also given to Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I trust there will be common consent to lay that important question aside.

Mr. SUMNER. What was the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to print certain testimony.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that that be postponed until to-morrow, for the purpose of enabling us to proceed with the resolution under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say a word or two in reply to the constitutional argument of my distinguished friend from Ohio, because I am considerably surprised that he should advance the doctrines that he does.

I believe it has been generally decided by the courts of the United States, always decided, that where in respect to a particular subject a power was given to one branch of the Government it must be taken as a general rule to be exclusive. Whether that power is granted as an imperative power that must be exercised, or as a discretionary power that may be exercised, makes no difference in respect to its being entirely in the power of the department of the Government to which it may be confided. Therefore the fact that the language of the Constitution is that the President "may" convene Congress on extraordinary occasions furnishes no argument in favor of there being an implied or independent or coexisting power in some other body, any stronger than that argument would be if the Constitution had said the President "shall" convene Congress on extraordinary occasions. The object of using the word "may" rather than "shall" evidently was to repose in him the discretion of deciding when and what should be an extraordinary occasion that should authorize the re-assembling of the legislative department of the Government that had dispersed. If, therefore, in the case supposed, Congress may by law, or without law—because to make a law takes the assent of the President—if Congress may by concurrent resolution provide some other power or tribunal or test for the assembling of Congress on extraordinary occasions, it seems to me that you overturn the grant of most of the powers that are supposed, and always have been supposed, to be exclusive, that the Constitution confers on any of the departments of the Government.

I think, then, that most lawyers would agree with me in saying, and most judges have agreed in saying, that where power over a particular subject is reposed in one department of the Government, whether imperative or discretionary, no matter which, that power is to be exercised by that department to the exclusion of others, because otherwise there would be a conflict of departments at once if they should happen to disagree. And in order to reach that construction it is not necessary that the language should be in terms exclusive, as if the Constitution-makers were drawing up pleas in abatement and were obliged to rebut every possible implication.

But look a little further. What are the powers vested in Congress? My friend says that they are authorized to borrow money; and he inquires with an air of triumph, "Is it to be said that Congress is to form itself into a committee and go about the streets borrowing money? It must employ agents to execute its will." That is a perfectly fair argument; but let me remind my friend that by another provision of the Constitution Congress, in order to borrow money, must do it by law. It is not the two Houses of Congress that borrow money, although the term "Congress" is used. Every one of the legislative powers vested in the two Houses is referred to Congress as a body; but there is another clause of the Constitution which declares that no act of theirs shall become a law or be valid until it is approved by the President of the United States, or passed against his disapproval by two thirds of the body. Therefore, when we go into the market to borrow money or exercise any other one of the functions that the Constitution reposes in us, we execute and perform those functions by force of a law which selects the agents, leaves nothing to discretion except to perform our will.

How do you distinguish, says my friend, between that case and the one under consideration? Why, sir, what are we to do here? Without law the two Houses are to delegate to their Presiding Officers a discretion as to will, as to time, as to emergency. When the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives get together to consult as to the state of public safety, to say whether we ought to assemble or not, are they executing our will, or are they exercising an individual judgment and discretion of their own over the subject of when Congress should assemble, or whether there is occasion for it, which we have undertaken to confide to them? There is no principle better known in constitutional or legislative law than that legislative powers cannot be delegated. That is well understood everywhere. Now, what do we delegate in this case? We do not delegate the performance of an executive act, executing our will at a particular time; we might do that; but we delegate the trust that we ourselves now may decide if we choose to two persons to decide, when and under what circumstances Congress shall reconvene. There is no warrant for that in the Constitution, as it seems to me. When you, sir, and the Speaker of the House act under such an authority, you are not doing anything that we have required you to do, but you are exercising an authority dependent upon your own judgment and discretion, instead of depending upon ours. Your discretion and judgment may be perfectly right, and I have no doubt would be as a matter of fact, but as a matter of law the judgment and discretion which the Constitution imposes in these two bodies is delegated to one member of each; and we should have exactly the same power in making a law to delegate to the Presiding Officers of the two Houses the power to make that law, provided the President would approve it, that we should have to delegate this authority, because it is a function that we must exercise as a body, we must decide. Having decided, we can leave it to the executive officers possibly to carry our decision into effect, and that is the ground upon which my amendment is offered. That is, we decide that we will adjourn to a particular day, and then if a particular contingency does not happen it is left to nobody's discretion, to nobody's judgment, but an existing fact; then you are further directed to do another thing, and you do it. That possibly, probably, we may lawfully do, although that would be open to some slight doubt as standing in opposition to that clause which authorizes less than a quorum of the two bodies to adjourn from day to day—a clear and express grant of power to less than a quorum to adjourn from day to day and to continue to sit. But still my own opinion is that this law will stand the test of constitutional investigation as executing an order of the two Houses when they again meet, acting on their responsibility. Less than that it appears we cannot possibly do.

But my friend from Ohio says, "What if this power is doubtful; who can question it; who can overthrow us; if we meet here even if we have not the authority," as he seems to maintain, "on your call and that of the Speaker of the House, who is to turn us out, who is to question our supreme authority to be an organized and legal body?" I will answer that by putting a similar question: suppose we adjourn without day and go home, and then we get together here all of us on the 4th day of July, and you take your chair, and the Speaker takes his, who is to question our authority? I take it, it would be the duty of the executive department of the Government to question our authority unless he means to have a mob legislature. We should be an assemblage of highly respectable individuals who had gotten together in Washington on the 4th day of July, that is all; and the Executive in my opinion would be perfectly justified in holding no communication with us whatever, because it would be a revolutionary assemblage and nothing else. However perfect and pure the motives of every man who assembled here might be, however high the emergency which should call us together, the body would be nothing but a revolutionary body; and in these disturbed and troublous times it would be a sad precedent indeed to undertake to disorganize the order we have for the purpose of stamping somebody to question it. If there is any ground to suppose that there is any need at all for our coming together in midsummer, we ought to avoid every possible question as to the regularity of the means by which we get together. There is much less question in the manner that proposed than there is in the other, as it appears to me.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont in the remarks which he has just made has touched upon the very point of question which exists as to the amendment he himself has offered. His amendment authorizes an adjournment of the two Houses in July next unless the two Houses then otherwise order. Now, sir, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the very clause of the Constitution to which he referred, that which authorizes a smaller number than a quorum to "adjourn from day to day" and to "compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." Suppose that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont be adopted, and both Houses concur in the resolution in that form, I suggest to the honorable Senator that possibly when a minority, less than a quorum of the two Houses, assemble here on the day named, they might have under the Constitution the power to adjourn over from day to day, and to send the Sergeant-at-Arms to compel the attendance of absent members, and they might have the power to order that the two Houses should not be adjourned over until December in the manner contemplated by the resolution.

Mr. President, there is one very simple way of avoiding every question about this matter, and I desire to call the attention of Senators to that mode. If we are to have an adjournment of this kind, with power to meet between now and the first Monday in December, I submit that the only way you can put it in which there shall be no possible question is that which I proposed the day before yesterday: that if a quorum of the two Houses be not present on the intermediate day named then the Presiding Officers shall adjourn the two Houses over to another day. That brings the two Houses in conflict with no provision whatever of the Constitution; there can be no question made under any provision of the Constitution upon that mode of proceeding. But in the shape that the Senator from Vermont puts the matter, it is open to question whether a small number of the members of the two Houses coming here on the day fixed will not have the power to adjourn from day to day and to compel the attendance of absent members.

I do hope that the Senate will consider this matter, and if they should finally (as I think it would be very wise in them to do, and as I have urged them to do) vote in favor of intermediate times of meeting between now and the first Monday of December, I think there is no shape in which they can put the matter that is so entirely free from objection as that which I presented the day before yesterday: to authorize the officers of the two Houses, unless there be a quorum present on the designated day, then to adjourn the two Houses over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the difficulty stated by the Senator from Missouri is really an existing difficulty, and he is right in his suppositions, the same rule would apply at present. Suppose we now pass a concurrent resolution that on Monday next at twelve o'clock the Presiding Officers of the two Houses adjourn their respective Houses without day, and that resolution is passed by a quorum; when Monday comes there are but a dozen members of each House present; the rest have gone home. According to the argument of the Senator from Missouri that dozen in each House may refuse to adjourn and may compel all the others to come back. I think he would hardly contend that; and unless that consequence would follow the power to adjourn and decide what action shall be taken on a future particular day, unless it be otherwise ordered, amounts to the same thing. If there be a quorum of the two Houses present, then they may order otherwise; if not, less than a quorum have no power to control the proceedings and actions of the two Houses, for it is only an adjournment after all.

Mr. DRAKE. With all respect to the honorable Senator from Maine, I must differ from him on that proposition, for this reason: when the two Houses have passed a joint resolution with regard to an adjournment, a quorum being present in both Houses and voting upon it, and when they have by such a resolution imposed upon the Presiding Officers of the two Houses a duty under given circumstances, that is just as much a law to those two officers as if it were a statute upon the statute-book of the nation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely what I contend. It is a law to them that they must adjourn the two Houses on that day. So, it being a part of the same resolution in this case, that when the time arrives to which we propose to adjourn in July, if that is fixed, then, unless it be otherwise ordered a certain other thing shall be done, it is equally imperative on the Presiding Officers of the two Houses then to do that thing. Nobody can control those Presiding Officers except a quorum of each House. If a quorum of the two bodies be present and agree otherwise, very well; if not, this law or order must be carried into execution.

Mr. DRAKE. The point suggested by the Senator from Maine is the very point about which the controversy may arise, to wit: that when we meet in July none but a quorum of the two Houses can control the action which the Presiding Officers take under the resolution we may adopt now. When the Constitution expressly says that a number less than a quorum shall have a particular power, can we take that particular power from them, when we leave the matter in a position when they may act under that power?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose we should pass to-day a resolution to adjourn to-morrow without day at twelve o'clock, and that to-morrow at twelve o'clock there should be only twenty-five Senators here present, and fifty members of the House, does the Senator from Missouri mean to say that the twenty-five men here and the fifty there could adjourn until the next day?

Mr. DRAKE. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then where is the difference between that case and ordering that the two Houses shall adjourn two weeks hence or three months hence?

Mr. DRAKE. Just simply because they will not in July, when they come here, I take it, be as clearly under the operation of this resolution as framed by the honorable Senator from Vermont as they would be to-morrow under a resolution now adopted, such as is suggested. The very object I aim at is to shut down upon the possibility of a minority, a number less than a quorum, availing itself of that provision of the Constitution. Why will not the honorable Senator from Vermont, instead of using the phraseology "unless otherwise ordered," adopt the other phraseology, and say that unless a quorum of both Houses be present the thing shall not be done? Then you do not leave any question. The two Houses have ordered that a minority who may be in attendance shall not do what is feared. If the honorable Senator from Vermont will adopt that phraseology it will cover, in my opinion, the whole case, and get rid of every possible objection. There cannot be, in my opinion, any way in which the ingenuity of man can contrive to get around the effect of the resolution so worded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will assure my friend from Missouri that the other day, before this question arose in the Senate, I framed an amendment in just the way that he names, and another gentleman framed another in the form in which this is now presented, and I was convinced in thinking it over for two or three days that this form on the whole was the best. That is the reason why I stick to this, although they both mean exactly the same thing.

Mr. MORTON. I think the careful consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will not allow the order implied in the phrase "unless otherwise ordered" to be made by less than a quorum of each House; but still there may perhaps be an argument made that a minority less than a quorum might "otherwise order" an adjournment until the next day and send for absent members. The Constitution expressly provides that less than a quorum may adjourn from day to day, and may send for and compel the attendance of absent members. That is the only case in which less than a quorum is permitted to act. Now, suppose that on the first Wednesday in July some twenty members of the Senate and fifty members of the House come here, and they are of opinion that it is very important that Congress should be in session; they believe there is an emergency requiring the assembling of Congress, and they assume that less than a quorum is authorized to "otherwise order" in respect to the question of adjournment, and to meet from day to day, and send for absent members until the presence of a quorum is secured. For the purpose of preventing the possibility of any difficulty of that kind I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri ought to be adopted, and then there can be no two opinions in regard to the effect of the proposition.

The amendment of the Senator from Vermont obviates the constitutional difficulty to which I referred some days since, because it places the adjournment, not upon the discretion of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, but upon the absolute order of Congress themselves, and intrusts to those two officers simply the performance of a mere ministerial duty. I think it very clear that we have no power to place in the hands of those officers the determination of the question whether Congress shall meet.

The Senator from Ohio likens it to the case of borrowing money, which he says Congress has power to do, and yet Congress does not go out itself and borrow money in Wall street, but acts through agents. Let me say to the Senator that Congress can borrow no money except in pursuance of law, and the agents to do the business are appointed by the law or created under it. Now, let me ask the Senator a question: Congress, under the Constitution, has power to levy taxes; can Congress depute the President of the Senate and the Speaker of House to make a levy of taxes, to determine the amount, to make the assessment, and provide for the collection? All that is purely legislative business, and the assessors and collectors are the agents created by law for the purpose of performing the duty. The question of adjournment is a legislative one. As the Senator has said, Congress may remain in session all the time, or it may adjourn from day to day or from month to month, but that is a matter within the power and the discretion of Congress. It cannot permit the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House to exercise that power as to when Congress shall meet and as to when Congress shall adjourn. That is purely a legislative question, which we have no more power to depute anybody else than we have to depute the power of levying and assessing taxes and providing for the means of collection. I think, however, that to avoid trouble and misconception the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri ought to be adopted, providing that the order referred to in the phrase "unless otherwise ordered" cannot be made except by a quorum of each House. That would avoid all questions in the future.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By the leave of the Senate, I will, at the request of several Senators, modify my amendment so as to make the last adjournment until the first Monday of December.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as modified by the mover, will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby instructed to adjourn their respective Houses at noon on the 29th day of March, instant, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867; and that, unless otherwise ordered by both Houses, they, at one o'clock on the afternoon of the next day thereafter, further adjourn their respective Houses to the first Monday of December, 1887.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not changed the views which I originally entertained as to the propriety of an adjournment of Congress in the usual way to the usual time of meeting; but there seems to be a difference between the two Houses on that subject, and a desire on the part of the House of Representatives, and many members of the Senate also, that Congress should retain within itself in some form the power of assembling at some intermediate time or times. While I do not attach any importance to that provision, while I do not believe that if that simple authority is given there will be any occasion to exercise it, and trust there may be none, still, as we must arrange this matter satisfactorily, and, if we can, come to some sort of an agreement, and I do not regard it as any sacrifice of principle, I am not disposed to be tenacious about the form of adjournment, and shall acquiesce with our friends in providing for an intermediate session.

In regard to the difficulty or supposed difficulty of my friends from Missouri and Indiana, I suggest to them that all possible question would be avoided, and the resolution would be just as well, if the words "unless otherwise ordered" were stricken out. Then it would make it the duty of the Presiding Officers to adjourn their respective Houses from the first Wednesday of July, if that is the day fixed, to the first Monday of December. That will be made their duty; but if a majority come here and rescind the resolution no adjournment will take place. I think we need not say anything about "unless otherwise ordered." The words "unless otherwise ordered" have no legal effect.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Why not say "unless otherwise ordered by a quorum of each House?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. It could only be by a quorum; less than a quorum could not make the order. If a resolution is now passed by both Houses directing the Presiding Officers of the respective Houses at a particular time to close the session, they must close it at that time; but if before that time arrives the resolution is rescinded they cannot close the session at that time. The words "unless otherwise ordered" in the resolution have no meaning in a legal sense. If a quorum came here at the time designated and desired to transact business, as a matter of course they would rescind the resolution, and then the Presiding Officers could not carry it into effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment offered by the honorable member from Vermont gets rid of the constitutional objection to which I think the original proposition was obnoxious. I do not propose, therefore, to state why, in my opinion, that was liable to constitutional objection; but so far as the amendment is concerned it is justified as I think by the power which Congress has, if the two Houses can agree, to adjourn from month to month or to any specific time. In other words, the power of adjournment without any limitation whatever as to the time of adjournment is vested exclusively in the two Houses of Congress, if they can agree in its exercise. On the contingency of their not being able to agree the Constitution provides that the Executive shall fix the day. The only doubt, therefore, is the one suggested by the honorable member from Missouri as to the construction of the amendment. I understand him to say that if the amendment passes it will be in the power of less than a quorum of either branch, if they should be present at the first day to which the two Houses are to stand adjourned, to prevent an adjournment over by exercising the power which is in words by the Constitution conferred upon each House of adjourning from day to day at the instance of a number less than a quorum.

Mr. DRAKE. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will state that I did not assert that power for less than a quorum, but I said the matter was open for question.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understood. The only doubt is whether the suggestion is warranted at all. I think, with all respect to the honorable member, that it is not warranted, Congress having the authority to adjourn certainly has the authority to direct the Presiding Officers to adjourn them on any day they think proper; and that has been often done, and when the hour fixed for the adjournment arrives the Presiding Officers in the two branches announce that Congress stands adjourned. Then the only question is whether they will be bound so to declare on the second day, to which the adjournment is to be made by this amendment, provided there be any members then present claiming the right to adjourn from day to day. I think the power very clear, and that it would then be the duty of the Presiding Officers to adjourn the two Houses unless they were ordered not to adjourn them by both Houses. Now, what is a House, and what is a Senate competent to pass an order? It is a quorum of each branch, and consequently if there is not a quorum on the day at which the adjournment is to be had the Presiding Officers will be as much bound to declare Congress adjourned on the second day as they will be bound to declare Congress adjourned on the first day.

The honorable Senator from Illinois suggests that the difficulty mentioned by the honorable Senator from Missouri might be avoided by striking out of the amendment the words "unless otherwise ordered." With due deference to him, I think that, if adopted, would give more force to the objection than it would have if the amendment were passed in the shape in which it is presented by the honorable member from Vermont; for then it would read that the two Houses are to adjourn on Friday, if that is the day we are to fix, until the first Wednesday of July, and that they are on that day to adjourn to December. Now, suppose we pass it in that form without providing that that authority to adjourn from July to December is to be subject to the order of the two Houses; then, if less than a majority of the Senate are here on that day, and less than a majority of the other House, those present may claim that we have not taken from them the authority to adjourn from day to day, and they may say that they will continue to exercise that power until they can bring in a quorum, and as they have the authority under the Constitution to adjourn from day to day, being less than a quorum, and to send for absent members, they may send for them.

I may be wrong in what I have stated in relation to the suggested alteration of the amendment which came from the honorable Senator from Illinois; but I am satisfied, with due respect to the honorable member from Missouri, that I must be right when I say that unless there is a quorum of the two Houses present on the day to which we propose first to adjourn by the terms of the resolution it will be the duty of the Presiding Officers to adjourn Congress on that day, and it will be their duty, if there is a quorum present, to adjourn on that day unless the two Houses order otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is that amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No. It is in the second degree now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest Saturday, the 30th, instead of Friday, the 29th, as the day of adjournment.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to inquire of the honorable Senator from Vermont what his particular reason is for fixing on a day in July instead of June for the two Houses to meet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The particular reason I had, being opposed myself to meeting in June or July or August, was to accommodate the views of the Senate, if I could, to those of the House, who were determined to have two meetings, one in June and one in September, by dividing the time and putting one meeting in July, so that the spaces between now and July, and July and December, would be nearly equal. The theory of somebody seems to be that there is some apprehended danger of some extraordinary event or something that is likely to happen at some time, nobody knows when, that we ought to keep watch of; and therefore, calculating the probability of chances, it seems most likely that we shall hit this calamity by dividing the time as nearly equally as possible. That is the only reason I can give.

Mr. DRAKE. I would suggest that the honorable Senator from Vermont might know perfectly well, as doubtless he does know, that nothing short of a convulsion of empires would bring a majority of the two Houses here in the month of July.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope nothing short of that will.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope the Senator's amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont, as it is in order now to make inquiries of him, whether he regards this as a continuous session from the first meeting of Congress on the 4th day of March until the first Monday in December, or whether these are two different sessions? Is the meeting of Congress in July, in case it should occur, to begin a new session, or is it to be a part of this session? If we agree to this resolution, and Congress adjourns from July to the first Monday in December, I should like to know whether Congress then meets, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, and commences a new session, or whether it is to meet under this resolution in continuation of this session, and whether we come back on the first Monday of December to attend the first session of the Fortieth Congress? If that be so, as I am a member of the Finance Committee, it is necessary that I should intimate to gentlemen that if we come back on the first Monday of December to attend a meeting of this session of Congress, we shall not be entitled to mileage, as I understand. But if we come back on the first Monday of December, pursuant to the provision of the Constitution, we then come to commence a new and distinct session of Congress. I find that at the last session an act was passed providing:

"That in addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress, there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, at twelve o'clock meridian on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, except that when the 4th of March occurs on Sunday, then the meeting shall take place at the same hour on the next succeeding day."

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person who was a member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session provided for by the foregoing section."

This law provides for an additional meeting of the Fortieth Congress on the 4th day of March, and it is a law passed by both Houses and approved by the President, as provided for in the Constitution. Now, I desire to know whether the meeting for which this concurrent resolution provides, on the first Wednesday of July, is or is not a meeting such as this law provides for, or is it the reassembling of this identical session of Congress, and will the meeting, for which this resolution provides, on the first Monday of December, be a reassembling of this first session of the Fortieth Congress?

Mr. ANTHONY. This is the first session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it is; but this resolution provides for an adjournment to a particular day in July, and then for a meeting on the first Monday of December; and it seems to me that the meeting on the first Monday of December, for which it provides, will be simply another meeting of the first session of the Fortieth Congress; and other questions will arise. Is the time between this and the first Wednesday in July a recess, such as the Constitution contemplates, in which the President can fill vacancies, or is Congress in session? And after that time, until the first Monday of December, is there a recess in which, when vacancies occur, the President can fill them; or is Congress still in session? I should like some explanation on these points, as they occasion trouble in my mind. I presume the honorable Senator from Vermont can make the explanation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend has put me so many knotty questions that I want to ask his leave to wait until the first Monday of December before I answer them all, as we have a great deal to do just now. But it is true, as he says, in substance, that the last clause of this amendment is entirely unnecessary; an adjournment without day would effectuate precisely the same purpose; and as he seems to have a good many metaphysical doubts in his mind upon that subject (and I never knew that he had any upon any other, I am glad to say) I will relieve those doubts by disposing of the subject by a further modification, so that the amendment will simply direct the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, on the occasion named in July, to adjourn their respective Houses without day; the effect of which will be to carry us over to December, and I do that in deference to the painful state of anxiety that I see my friend from Oregon is in.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is some question as to whether the time between this and the first Wednesday of July will not be a recess, during which a great many employés would draw their compensation. I presume myself, as the session would be continued, and this would be a mere recess and not an adjournment, the clerks of committees, &c., would draw their pay. I presume it is not the purpose to have anything of that kind done, and therefore I want to add a provision on that subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection, if the provision is such a one that it does not require presidential assent.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a matter in the power of either House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will hear the Senator's proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to add this proviso:

Provided, That clerks of committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, who do not receive a yearly compensation, shall only be paid for the days that Congress shall be actually in session previous to the first Monday of December next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will modify my amendment by adding that.

Mr. DRAKE. I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is open to amendment, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. DRAKE. Is it not in order to strike out "July" and insert "June?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not open to amendment unless by the consent of the mover. He may modify it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish further to modify my amendment to meet another objection that has been made or to avoid a conclusion, and that is to insert after "1867" where it occurs after "July" the words "when the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause the roll of each House respectively to be called," and then after the word "thereafter" to insert the same words. I also propose to name the 30th of March as the day for the adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby instructed to adjourn their respective Houses at noon on the 30th day of March, instant, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867, when the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause the roll of each House respectively to be read, and the roll of each House respectively to be read, and that unless otherwise ordered by both Houses they at one o'clock in the afternoon of the next day thereafter, when they shall cause the roll of each House respectively to be read, shall thereupon further adjourn their respective Houses without day.

Mr. DRAKE. That is in substance, if I understand it now, coming around to the position I asked the gentleman to take. I asked him to use simply the language "unless a quorum of both Houses be present the said officers shall further adjourn," &c. Now, the gentleman gives direction that the roll shall be called, and then the two Houses shall adjourn. That, I take it, is just about coming around to the position I have been struggling here now on two occasions to get the Senate to, when it might be expressed in about six words: "unless a quorum of both Houses be present." I hope the amendment will be put in such a shape that we can understand it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like, at some stage of our proceedings on this resolution, to get a distinct vote upon the question of adjourning at twelve o'clock to-morrow, free from all other questions; and I desire to ascertain from the Chair at what stage I can accomplish that object. I am content to do it by dividing the question on the motion submitted by the Senator from Vermont, or by moving to strike out all that part of his resolution which follows the first provision. In whichever mode I can accomplish it, I desire to make some motion so as to raise distinctly the simple question of an absolute adjournment at twelve o'clock to-morrow. Would it be in order to make a motion to strike out any part of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion would not now be in order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I ask for a division of the question, so as to have a vote first on the first clause of the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he will accomplish the object by voting down all the amendments. The resolution which the Senate passed originally is pending here, and there is a House amendment to it, to which amendment we now propose an amendment. The resolution of the Senate is a clean resolution for an adjournment of the two Houses, closing the session in the ordinary way. If these amendments be voted down, we come back to the original proposition passed by the Senate, which was that the Presiding Officers close the present session by an adjournment of the two Houses at twelve o'clock to-day; but that could be altered so as to read "to-morrow" or "Saturday." If these amendments are all voted down we then come back to our original proposition.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe that as the amendment of the Senator from Vermont now reads, there is to be but one intermediate meeting on the first Wednesday of July. I would inquire of him if I am correct in that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir. It only provides for a meeting on the first Wednesday of July and for a final adjournment on the next day.

Mr. HOWARD. I am opposed to that. I prefer the House resolution to that. If it be necessary to take any precautions at all between this time and the first of December, it seems to me that two meetings are at least few enough in that regard. I hope this amendment will not be made.

Mr. DRAKE. I understand that no amendment can now be offered to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not amendable.

Mr. DRAKE. And I understand that after the Senate shall have adopted it there can then be no amendment offered to it; and therefore we have got to take the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont as a whole or reject it as a whole. Am I right in that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Entirely right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is an amendment in the second degree, and is not open to further amendment. It may be that after it is adopted, amendments can still be made.

Mr. DRAKE. The gentleman from Vermont insists upon it that his amendment has to be taken now as a whole or rejected as a whole, and that if it is adopted by the Senate it is not subject to amendment after its adoption.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is true.

Mr. DRAKE. If that is the case I hope the Senate will not adopt it; for I think it defeats the whole object we have in view in an intermediate session of Congress, or paving the way for it, on the first Wednesday of July.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to modify the language of the amendment which I suggested. It seems that the clerks of some of the committees of the House, like the Committee on the Judiciary, are actually employed now, and will be during the recess, under the orders of their committees. They ought to be paid. I therefore modify the proviso which I offered so as to read:

Provided, That clerks of committees of the Senate and House of Representatives who do not receive a yearly compensation, and who are not actually employed during the recess by order of a committee of either House, shall only be paid for the days that Congress shall be actually in session previous to the first Monday of December.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I accept that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that it is true that by our rules—and there must be rules for everything—the amendment which I have proposed cannot be amended in hostility to its purpose, that is, against my consent; and of course every Senator understands that if he has any better proposition which he thinks the Senate is likely to agree to, all he has to do is to vote against this. If this amendment is rejected, then the question will be, what shall be done next; and my friend from Missouri can submit his proposition.

I stated to the Senate before that I did not like my own amendment, because I did not believe in meeting in July or any other intermediate time, except October or November, and then for the purpose of business, and not for the purpose of any unforeseen emergency, but to go on with the work. I believe I have explained as fully as it was necessary that I only proposed this amendment with a view of accommodating in a degree our views to those of the House of Representatives, who have just as good a right as we have to have their opinions about it, and they think there ought to be a good many intermediate meetings.

Mr. DRAKE. In consequence of the remarks just made by the honorable Senator from Vermont, I wish to give notice that if his amendment fails I shall offer one which will manifestly be more in accordance with the wishes of the House of Representatives, and with the permission of the Senate I will read it now. It is to strike out of the House amendment all after the word "June" and in lieu thereof to insert "when," that is, on the first Monday of June, "unless a quorum of both Houses be present said officers shall further adjourn the said Houses over until the first Wednesday of September next, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, they shall further adjourn the said Houses without day."

This will be manifestly more in accordance with the wishes of the other branch of Congress. They have sent us a proposition here for two days of meeting between now and December. The gentleman substitutes one. I hope that his amendment will not be adopted, so that we shall have an opportunity to vote upon this other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senate seems to have arrived at a point where the difference is one of form rather than of substance. We have been occupied for some minutes, ay more than that, almost an hour, in discussing the phraseology of the resolution. We have reached the great point which was the subject of such earnest discussion two or three days ago, that Congress ought in some way or other to secure to itself the power of meeting during the long period between now and next December. I understand Senators are all agreed on that point. They adopt it. I am glad of it. It has been only by time and by discussion that we have reached that harmony. The House has given us three opportunities. The old story of the Sybil has been repeated. Once, twice, thrice she came. Twice the king rejected the book of wisdom. Twice the Senate has rejected the offer of the House; and now the third time, so far as I can understand by what has fallen from Senators in this discussion, it is ready to adopt the proposition of the House; substantially I mean, for the proposition of the House, as I understand it, is simply to secure to Congress an opportunity of coming together during the summer and autumn. Now, the practical question is, how shall that best be accomplished? For one, I am ready to accept either of the forms proposed. I am willing to accept the form that the House sent us; I do not see that that is objectionable. I am ready, if I can get nothing better, to accept the form just now proposed by the Senator from Vermont; but I must confess that I do think the form proposed by the Senator from Missouri is briefer, clearer, better. Therefore, I am free to say that if I could have my own way about it I would set aside the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, and fall back upon that of the Senator from Missouri. It seems to me that it better expresses the conclusion which I am glad to see we have at last reached.

I believe it is already settled that we shall not adjourn to-morrow. Am I right in that? I believe the proposition is to adjourn on Saturday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I am glad of it. That is a gain of a day. We were to adjourn to-day at twelve o'clock, and then again we were to adjourn to-morrow at twelve o'clock, and now it is put off until Saturday. I think the Senate would do much better if it put off the adjournment until next week. There is important business now on your table which ought to be considered. Here is a bill on your table, "a bill providing for a change in the time of electing a mayor and other officers for the city of Washington." It is simply to give the new voting population of Washington an opportunity of electing a mayor. They are during this coming month of June to elect a city government, aldermen, and a common council, but not a mayor. What will be the condition of things if they do not elect a mayor? You will have a mayor elected under the old dispensation when colored people did not vote, and surrounded by a city government elected under the new dispensation when colored people do vote. Now, I think that you ought to bring the different branches of the government of the city of Washington into harmony. That can only be done by a new act of Congress authorizing the election of a mayor this month of June, at the same time that they elect other city officers.

That is a question of great importance. Citizens in Washington are very much perplexed by the idea that Congress may go home without attending to that important question. For instance, I have a letter that I have received this morning from a citizen here, from which I will read a brief sentence:

"We Republicans would feel exceedingly sorry if Congress should adjourn without passing that most important bill. May we not ask that the Committee for the District report said bill and proviso at the earliest moment possible?"

Then here is a resolution adopted by a Republican club on Monday, the 18th of March, as follows:

"We earnestly deprecate any action of the Fortieth Congress which would prevent the ordinary municipal election, and we respectfully ask the immediate passage of the bill, now in the hands of the Committee for the District, authorizing an election for mayor and comptroller in the month of June next."

Are you ready to go home leaving the government of the city of Washington in this anomalous condition, with a mayor who will not sympathize with the majority of the population or with his associates in the city government? That is something to do. Senators say we have completed our work. I answer there is something to do.

Then here is another proposition which I have once before characterized as an effort to cut the gordian knot of the suffrage question. Here is a bill introduced by myself the other day to carry out various constitutional provisions, securing political rights in all our States, precisely as we have already secured civil rights. The importance of this bill at this moment cannot be exaggerated. There is not a Senator now on this floor who does not know the anxious condition of things in the neighboring State of Maryland for the want of just such a bill as this. Let Congress interfere under the Constitution and exercise a power that clearly belongs to it, that I submit now can no longer be questioned, and settle this whole suffrage question, so that it shall no longer agitate the politics of the States, so that it shall no longer be the occasion of dissension, possibly of bloodshed in the State of Maryland or in Delaware, or I may say of any difference of opinion in Ohio. Let us settle the question before we go home. That is one reason why I am glad we have postponed our adjournment until Saturday. I wish we could go further and continue in session until we have reached a conclusion on at least these two important bills.

When I rose I had no purpose of calling attention to these matters now. My special object was to express my satisfaction that the Senate at last is disposed to harmonize with the other House on the important question of securing to Congress the power of meeting during the summer and autumn. That is a great point gained, I submit, for the peace and the welfare of the country. Without it you will leave this country a prey to the President; you will leave our Union friends throughout all the South a prey to the same malignant usurper.

Mr. YATES. I rise almost for the identical purpose which actuated the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I rise to congratulate some of my peers upon the wise conclusion to which they have come. I especially thank the honorable Senator from Ohio for the graceful manner in which he has retired from his former position to the present position which has been adopted by the House. Sir, this is one of the propositions for which I have been in dead earnest. I verily believe, or I should not have spoken—for I have not troubled the Senate with my speeches—that if this Congress had adjourned without the power to reassemble, it would have been the greatest mistake of the century and of the age in which we live.

I am not one of those who desire that the Union Republican party, which has fought this glorious battle so long upon principle, shall stop half way. Sir, the moment that a progressive party in this country or any other stops half way, the moment it shows any faltering in courage, in determination to carry its purposes, that moment that party commences the backward movement. "Progress, onward and onward," is the motto of every truly progressive party. If we had adjourned under the circumstances supposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio we should have lost the prestige which now belongs to the Republican Union party, and our party would have met the fate of all those conservative Union projects which heretofore have killed off so many of our greatest and best men. Our political graves are now full of the dead of buried conservatism.

The honorable Senator from Ohio says there is no danger. Why, sir, when we adjourned last summer we found this President, who is opposed to us, who is opposed to our policy, who is in favor of southern and secession policy, conniving at the revolutionary proceedings in the State of Maryland. We found him giving governmental sanction, as it were, to the proceedings of Governor Swann, and attempting there to frustrate or to thwart a fair registration of the voters of that State. Sir, no danger from the President! Look upon that bloodiest picture in the book of time, the New Orleans riot—the bloodiest, except the murderous assassination of our noble and great President. No danger, sir, when the President of the United States, with the weakness of Caligula and the despotism that characterized that tyrant and rendered him memorable for his cruelty, could sit in the White House and not only look coolly upon, but cause intervention in favor of, and give his direct sanction and approval to the means by which that bloodiest picture was consummated, to these acts of barbarity which sent a shudder throughout the world!

Tell me not there is no danger from such a President as that! Tell me not there is no danger if Congress leaves the mighty interests of this nation and the measures of reconstruction, which it has been so long inaugurating, in the hands of a man whom we know to be the enemy of the country, from the standpoint from which we view it, a man who has consulted with its enemies, who has abandoned his own party, who has proven untrue to every principle by which he secured our suffrages.

Sir, how soon, how very soon may the tide of political fortune be turned. A change in the result of the elections of New York, Indiana, and Ohio would transfer the power of this Government from the hands of the Republican Union party into the hands of secessionists and sympathizers with secession. While I am as sanguine as any man upon the subject of suffrage, while I believe that if we fight out that battle faithfully and truly we can carry it in the northern States, yet when I see so much conservative feeling as seems to have been manifested in the Legislature of the State of Ohio I am not sure that we can carry universal suffrage in more than four or five of the northern States.

We are very apt to imagine there is no danger. It is a delightful consolation for honorable Senators, in view of the stubborn facts by which they are surrounded, to sit still upon their seats and say there is no danger. One honorable Senator has even gone so far as to suggest that if an exigency should arise the President of the United States would call the two Houses together. Sir, he would not call these bodies together until Gabriel sounded his trumpet. He would rather see the ghost of Banquo than to see the honorable Senator from Wisconsin and such men as him here to attend to his case.

Mr. HOWE. I suggest that the Senator from Illinois does the taste of the President of the United States great injustice in the suggestion he has just made. [Laughter.]

Mr. YATES. De gustibus non est disputandum. I am willing and desire to stay here until the measure to which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has just alluded and that introduced by his colleague [Mr. WILSON] can be carried out. I think it was in 1865, on the 4th day of July, that I took ground for universal suffrage. I believe I was then the only politician in the country who came out publicly for universal suffrage. Other gentlemen were for "impartial suffrage." Even Frederick Douglass and Wendell Phillips were not then in favor of universal suffrage; they were satisfied with impartial suffrage. One year ago I introduced a bill which declared that universal suffrage should be the law in every State of this Union, not only in the rebel States, but in the State of Illinois, and I based my proposition upon the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery in every State and Territory of this Union, and particularly upon that clause of it which authorizes Congress to enforce freedom by appropriate legislation. I took the ground then, which I maintain to-day, that the black man can never have his freedom in this country until he has political as well as civil rights. I objected then, and I object now, to the strenuous effort made to draw a distinction between civil and political freedom. I maintain that that difference does not exist; but whether it exists or not, I stand here to-day, and those Senators who then voted with me in a minority of eight stand here today, to say that Congress has exercised this power; Congress has legislated upon the subject; and Congress has declared that no State shall come into this Union which does not in its organic law adopt the doctrine of universal, and not merely impartial, suffrage.

I am aware that my honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] gave us a lengthy dissertation upon the radical, physical imperfections of the negro. He told us that the hollow of his foot made a hole in the ground. Sir, thank God I have lived to see the day when in a recent election the hollow of his hand made a deep and permanent impression upon the platform for which the honorable Senator contends. Another friend of mine, who was then in this body, speaking of colored men voting, said he would not impose upon the colored man such immense and enormous risks; it would only result in getting his head broken at the polls; and yet at the election in Georgetown the other day we had through this very vote, at a mild, quiet, peaceable election, a majority of one thousand and forty and four, reminding me of those described in Scripture, the one hundred and forty thousand and four who came up in their white robes and with palms of victory, ballots in their hands, to declare the sweet Gospel to the nation.

Now, sir, I am not for this Congress adjourning until we have carried out the work of reconstruction and secured suffrage, not only in South Carolina, but in Illinois. We do not want any disturbance upon the question of negro suffrage in Maryland or in Illinois. We have declared that all men born on this soil are citizens. That is in the Constitution of the United States. If it was not there before, the last amendment to the Constitution has put it there. Congress has declared them citizens. Now, shall not Congress also declare that they are entitled to the rights and privileges of citizens? I want a complete and glorious and a triumphant emancipation.

I propose not to impose upon South Carolina or Georgia or Alabama any restrictions which I will not impose upon the State of Illinois. Under the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery in all the States and Territories with the power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation, under that clause of the Constitution which says that citizens of each State shall have the right of citizens in every State under the recent constitutional amendment, I believe we have power to declare universal suffrage to be the law of every State in the Union, as is proposed by bills introduced by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and by his colleague. We have the power to declare universal suffrage in every State of the Union. I am not afraid so far as Illinois is concerned to declare by my vote that every citizen, black and white, in that State shall be entitled to the right of suffrage.

One year ago when this subject was submitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as you, sir, will remember, a bill was reported for impartial suffrage, and upon my motion that bill was recommitted to the committee, and after a full discussion we decided to report a bill for universal suffrage, not because we were opposed to education and intelligence, but because we were in favor of education and intelligence, for the ballot is the educator in this country of American citizens. The right to vote, the right to hold office, inspires the desire to have education, and hence the schools and colleges which fill our land. It is the molding influence of our institutions which makes intelligent, worthy, noble, patriotic, and Christian citizens, and inspires the eloquence which fills the Hall of the House of Representatives and the Senate Chamber.

Now, sir, I am for a complete reconstruction; I am for moving onward and forward until this Congress shall have accomplished its high destiny. We have done much. We have put down the war waged against the Union. We have carried out the proclamation of emancipation. We have raised the noblest army in the world. We have equipped the finest navy that ever rode the seas. We have passed constitutional amendments by which we have attempted to secure freedom to four million of our fellow-citizens. Shall we stop now when in a few days we can pass the bills to which I have alluded, and instead of having an element of dissension in the States we can, by a legislative act entirely within our power under the Constitution, proclaim "liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof."

I care not in what shape the propositions now before us are finally presented, so that we have it in our power to control the President of the United States in his encroachments, in his usurpations, in his desire to reorganize the Government upon what we conceive to be principles inimical to its existence and perpetuity. I hope we shall not let go our hold; let us hold firmly our grasp as faithful sentinels upon the watch-tower of liberty. We will hold it until this Congress shall add to what it has done the cap-stone upon the proud monument and temple of liberty which it has been erecting.

[During Mr. YATES's remarks, a message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolution, in which it asked the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That on Friday, the 29th instant, at the hour of three o'clock p. m., the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn their respective Houses until Wednesday, the 5th day of June next, at twelve o'clock meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, those officers shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until Wednesday, the 4th day of September next, at twelve o'clock meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, they shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until the first Monday of December next.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very happy indeed to receive the congratulations of my friend from Illinois; but I am somewhat surprised that he selected me as the object of his congratulations.

Mr. YATES. Only for illustration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am surprised at it, for I believe I have not said one word about these resolutions of adjournment from the beginning of the controversy to this time; and I have been a good deal disgusted with the length of the debate on so plain a proposition. I did not say one word about it till I attempted this morning to defend the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, when I endeavored to show that we had the power to place in the hands of the officers of the two Houses the right to convene us on extraordinary occasions. The few remarks that I made do not seem to have impressed the Senate, for they are proceeding to act on the matter of convening the two Houses next summer. My own deliberate judgment is that there is nothing in the appearance of the times to justify or to call for any extraordinary measures. I have expressed that by my vote. The Senator from Illinois, however, thinks we ought to be kept here en permanence, or until certain great objects are accomplished; and now he proposes to compromise his view. He who would require us to stay here day by day to watch the President gives that up for what will be a ridiculous farce, and what every Senator knows will be a ridiculous farce. We know very well that if we adopt the resolution in the shape now presented we provide simply for a ridiculous farce. Each member will be left to judge for himself whether a contingency has arisen calling for his presence.

No one expects that Congress will convene under this proposition. No state of facts can probably arise which will induce a majority of the members of both Houses to come here in July to form a Congress, and unless a majority do of their own motion, without a call, come, nothing can be done except for the Presiding Officers to say that in pursuance of a resolution, passed on such a day, they adjourn the two Houses until the first Monday in December.

If the House of Representatives desire this I am willing to yield it to them in deference to our associates in legislation. It would be much better, in my judgment, to adopt the measure of the Senator from Massachusetts, the one I have voted for, to authorize the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, in whom we have entire confidence, in case of emergency to call us together. I do not fear that power, and do not apprehend that there will be any occasion for its exercise. I am not, therefore, anxious to have any proposition of this kind acted upon.

But now, I would ask the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Massachusetts why they lug into this debate the suffrage laws of Ohio? What have they to do with the question of our adjournment? The Senators desire to hold us here until we can repeal the constitution of the State of Ohio in regard to negro suffrage, and yet they are willing to compromise by adjourning to-morrow, if we only adopt a provision that we may come together in June or July if we choose. The Senator from Massachusetts said he would be willing to take that if he could not get anything better.

Mr. SUMNER. I have said that I thought Congress ought, before we go home now, to adopt a law that shall settle the suffrage question in every State of this Union, in Maryland and in Ohio. If I alluded to Ohio it was only by way of illustration, because unhappily we have seen in the newspapers recently something that Ohio has failed to do on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will refer to that. A majority of the Senate are congratulated because we have yielded our opinions so much as to agree to a possible meeting of Congress in July. We must congratulate our friends on the other side for yielding so much, giving up a session en permanence, sitting here to watch the President, for this slight shred that is given to them merely to enable them to back out. That is all there is of it. Now, I have no particular objection to having two or three of these "hop-skip-and-jump" meetings, as my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] very properly describes them, if Senators really desire them. If any ten Senators, any five Senators, or if even the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator, will say that in his deliberate judgment a state of affairs will arise between this and the next regular session of Congress which demands the extraordinary measure of convening Congress against the will of the President, I should feel disposed to yield to it, because I would sacrifice all my personal convenience to any substantial fear of that kind.

But there is no such fear. No one supposes the President has the power to do anything of the kind if he had the inclination, and we have no evidence that he has any such inclination. He is proceeding to enforce the laws which we have passed over his veto, and enforcing them precisely as we desire him to enforce them. The order of General Sheridan, published this morning, I give as an example. Then there is the appointment of General Pope. Every indication shows that the President contemplates a full execution of those laws. Why, then, should we abuse him now, when he is carrying out in good faith our laws? Why should we say anything against him or arraign him? On the other hand, let him go forward in the discharge of the high duties that are imposed upon him. If I believed there was any fear of his failure to do his duty I might think there was occasion to convene; but there is none. If Senators have any such fear, let us provide for meeting together in the mode I have mentioned.

Now, sir, let me say a word in behalf of the State of Ohio. I have heard imputations often cast upon my State, and I have sat here in silence, because I did not wish to drag before the Congress of the United States the business of the State of Ohio. Ohio can take care of her own domestic affairs. She neither thrusts them here nor seeks to defend them here, and I do not rise now to defend or apologize for the action of the State of Ohio. The people of Ohio take care of their own affairs, and they do not care what Senators here think and say of them. I tell you further that any attempt of Congress to interfere with matters which are within the legitimate power of the people of Ohio will only check their movements in the direction that you desire them to march. By this course you only excite among them a feeling of State pride, the same feeling which led many of the southern States into rebellion. My own deliberate conviction is that suffrage in Ohio will within a very few years be universal. I have not a doubt of it. I here express my own opinion on that subject. During the session I have written public letters to different members of the Legislature, giving my views. There is no opposition to universal suffrage among the Republicans of Ohio, the newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding; but there are some difficulties in the way. We are all committed there to the principle of universal suffrage; and why? Because we cannot fairly demand of the people of the southern States universal suffrage as a condition of their readmission to representation unless we yield it ourselves. Every man of the party to which I belong in Ohio feels the force of this consideration, and is well aware that it would be totally inconsistent to impose conditions on the southern States that we are not willing to apply to ourselves.

By the constitution of Ohio a convention will meet within three years to revise the whole State constitution, and then there will be no difficulty. In order, however, to amend the constitution in the mean time the amendment must be submitted by two thirds, or a majority of the Legislature, I have forgotten which, and it must be voted for by a majority of all the electors voting at the election; and it will be remembered that on that point in regard to the reconstruction law we had quite a discussion here; and the same difficulty which was explained then occurs in Ohio. Two hundred thousand persons might vote "yea" on a constitutional amendment and only two vote "nay," and yet if those two hundred thousand were not a majority of all the votes cast for any person on the ticket on that election the constitutional amendment would not be adopted. There is a difficulty. Now, the question with the Legislature of Ohio was whether we had better now submit the matter again to the people of the State, it having been once before submitted and rejected, and take their sense upon it at the coming fall election, or whether it would be better to postpone it until the organization of a State convention to revise the constitution, which will undoubtedly provide for universal suffrage.

There is no difference of sentiment among the Republicans of Ohio on the question. I have myself, and I know my colleague has done the same, urged members of the Legislature, in deference to the general public opinion of our party throughout the United States, to present the question to the people this fall, in the hope that by making it a party movement a sufficient number of the votes cast at the election may be obtained in favor of it. I have no doubt that when the election takes place a great majority of those voting on the proposition will vote in favor of it; but there must be a majority of all the votes cast at the time for any one of the officers on the ticket the same year. That is the difficulty in the way. My impression is, the recent information I have from Ohio is, that the Legislature will take this course and submit the question at the coming fall election. But let me say to Senators that nothing in the world would tend so much to check the strong feeling in my State in favor of that course as the threat from Massachusetts or Illinois that they will override the constitution of the State by congressional enactment.

Anything of that kind would only deter members of the Legislature and induce them to say, "Let them try it on," or something of that kind. We are all governed by such feelings. I trust Senators will do no such thing; and especially ought not my friend from Illinois to cast into the teeth of Ohio her laws upon this subject, when the constitution and the laws of Ohio are more liberal than those of any of the western States I believe. We allow a great many negroes to vote, all those nearer white than black, and the judges of election decide that matter, so that substantially the great majority of them are allowed to vote, and always have been under the old constitution; under the construction that has prevailed from 1802 to this time. In Illinois they have had until recently, and perhaps they have yet, laws which forbid negroes from coming into the State, from sitting on juries, from taking any part in the government. Now, it seems to me my friend from Illinois should take the beam out of his own eye before he undertakes to take out the mote in his neighbor's. He ought not to talk much about Ohio unless he talks a great deal about Illinois.

Mr. YATES. The Senator certainly does not represent my position correctly. I want the same law, a uniform law, a national law, for Ohio, Illinois, South Carolina, and Georgia; and I should like to ask the Senator now whether he will vote against a carefully-prepared bill, like that of the Senator from Massachusetts, to extend suffrage to Ohio as well as to Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will vote against any interference by Congress with what is within the legitimate power of the States.

Mr. YATES. Of course; but would this be an interference under the amendment to the Constitution which declares every American to be a citizen?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to go into that debate now. I could give my present impression, but it is really improper for us to discuss that question here now. The Senator must see that it is improper to discuss it. My own impression—I will be frank with him—is that the question of suffrage is entirely within the power of the States. We have imposed upon the conquered States as a condition universal suffrage, as one of the results of the war, and I have no doubt the people of the northern States will conform their institutions to that doctrine; but I doubt very much whether it is in the power of Congress to say who shall vote in Ohio under the plain provisions of the Constitution and the constitutional amendment fairly construed together. But it is scarcely worth while to drag that into the debate. We are proceeding in Ohio to accomplish the very result the Senator seeks, and he is throwing obstacles in the way. I say before he does that he ought to change the constitution and laws of the State of Illinois.

But, sir, what have all these things to do with this debate? We drag them in here on the mere question of whether we shall adjourn to-day or to-morrow, whether we shall provide for another session or not. Why drag the constitutions of Ohio and Illinois into the controversy? I do not see any reason for it; and I confess I cannot see any reason why I was called upon to say anything in this debate when I have carefully and purposely abstained from it except to advocate the proposition of my friend from Massachusetts. If I get into a scrape again by coming to his defense I will keep quiet when he offers a proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the matter now before the Senate be laid on the table for the present, in order to take up the other resolution on the subject of adjournment, which has been sent to us by the House of Representatives this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. Oh, no; let us dispose of this.

Mr. DRAKE. The House seeing that the time had passed contemplated by its former resolution for the adjournment of the two Houses, has sent us another resolution, and I think it would be only proper that we should consider that this latter resolution is intended by the House to supersede entirely its former proposition to us on the subject of adjournment. Therefore it is that I desire to bring that latest proposition from the House before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does it differ from the first one?

Mr. DRAKE. It differs very materially from the first one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How? Describe it.

Mr. DRAKE. The gentleman asks me how it differs—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay the pending resolution on the table, which is not debatable.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. DRAKE called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Drake, Fowler, Howard, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Harlan, Hendricks, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, and Saulsbury—12.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. DRAKE. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear it read in full as it stands?

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby instructed to adjourn their respective Houses at noon on the 30th day of March, instant, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867, at noon; when the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause the roll of each House respectively to be called; and that, unless otherwise ordered by both Houses, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, at one o'clock in the afternoon of the next day thereafter, shall again cause the roll of each House respectively to be called, and shall thereupon further adjourn their respective Houses without day: Provided, That clerks of committees of the Senate and House of Representatives who do not receive a yearly compensation, and who are not actually employed during the recess by order of a committee of either House, shall only be paid for the days that Congress shall be actually in session previous to the first Monday of December next.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. POMEROY. I cannot vote on the amendment, because, as I understand it, they cannot proceed to business if they would.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to debate.

Mr. JOHNSON. If there is any doubt about the phraseology, I suggest to my friend from Vermont that it had better be corrected by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is not a particle of doubt in my mind.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Fowler, Howard, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Harlan, Hendricks, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sherman—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the House, as amended, was concurred in.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that he had to-day approved and signed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 63) to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, for military purposes;

A bill (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of 2d of March, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 39, in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress. As it is necessary to amend it, it ought to be acted upon at the earliest possible moment. It will not take five minutes to dispose of it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that each Senator, member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate in Congress, after having taken and subscribed the required oath, shall be entitled to receive his compensation at the end of each month at the rate now established by law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following:

And an amount sufficient to pay their compensation and mileage to the 1st day of July next is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the iron-clad monitor Camanche; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of John Perry, and the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) to authorize the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases; and they were signed by the President pro tempore.

SHIP-CANAL AT FALLS OF THE OHIO.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take from the table House joint resolution No. 41, which was laid on the table this morning, I think by a misunderstanding. It is a resolution providing for the necessary survey for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That resolution will give rise to debate necessarily.

Mr. MORTON. I think not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall debate it myself under the circumstances.

Mr. MORTON. This is the only hope I have of getting it through. It is important to the trade of the upper Ohio that these surveys be made without further delay. The canal around the falls of the Ohio is wholly insufficient for the commerce of that river. It is a matter of the first importance to all the cities and all the country above Louisville, and in fact below, that these surveys be made, and that either a new canal shall be made or the old one enlarged. Therefore, we want the surveys made this summer, so that the report may be laid before Congress at the next session. I trust there will be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are a great many other matters that I suppose every gentleman interested in them thinks of importance. The most important matter, I take it, for the Senate generally is that we should get through with the business we must necessarily dispose of, and that is the executive business. There is but very little time left; there is a great deal of executive business on the table; we made no progress yesterday; and I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. I will make one remark on that. I hope that we shall not proceed with the consideration of executive business. The Senate can act on executive business by itself. It may be called together when the legislative session is over by the President, and probably will be, for the consideration of nominations. Why not, then, let all the executive business that is now before the Senate pass over for the present and proceed with important, essential legislative business? Let the Senator from Indiana proceed with his bill. There are one or two bills that I wish to proceed with, and which I regard as very important to the welfare of the country. I think the Senate ought to act on them before we go home. I think, therefore, that it would be the best economy of our time now, particularly after the vote to adjourn that we have taken to-day, if we proceed constantly with the legislative business until the hour of adjournment, and let all the executive business pass over to a called session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My opinion is that the more we legislate at this period of the session upon these bills coming from the House, most of them gotten up without the examination of a committee, the more mischief we shall do. Everybody has some sort of plan of his own. Now, sir, I suppose there are some two or three hundred nominations on the table—I do not know how many, but a very large number—and we all know that unless they are acted upon at this session they all fail, and they have got to be sent in again to the Senate; and we saw yesterday, from the course taken, what progress we made. We ought at least to dispose of those if we expect to get through. I am not so anxious about any particular bill myself, and I think all the bills that gentlemen have will keep without any great difficulty. At any rate, I think that the great majority of the Senate are most interested in getting through with the business that we must do and closing the session, without reference to the particular bills of Senators. After we have done that, I have no objection to taking up something else. I really hope that we shall go into executive session.

Mr. MORTON. We can continue the open business of the Senate for an hour, and then have time to get through with the executive business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my friend that we tried that yesterday, and how far did we get? We disposed of two or three cases.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator knows that every executive session is opened perhaps half a dozen times for the purpose of passing some little resolution or for some business that will take no longer than this. Now, sir, this is a resolution in which time is important. The difficulty occasioned to commerce by the want of a sufficient canal around the falls of the Ohio has long been complained of; and the people of that part of the great valley of the Mississippi and Ohio have a right to complain that their interests have been so long neglected. The interests involved in this improvement are very great. Our people trust to have these surveys made this summer, so that at the next session of Congress the proper appropriations may be made. I have not known of any refusal to make surveys by this Senate. They have been ordered in many cases where they were not of the hundredth part of the importance that they are in this case. I sincerely trust that there will be no opposition offered to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Fowler, Henderson, Howard, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Wiley, and Yates—18.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on taking up the resolution mentioned by the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes.

Mr. MORTON. I only wish to say one word in regard to this resolution. The canal around the falls of the Ohio was built some forty years ago. The locks are not sufficient to permit boats of the first class, or even of the second class, to pass through them. This statement alone will enable the Senate to understand the great difficulty commerce now labors under at that point. It is also the conviction of engineers, as I am informed, that the canal was built originally on the wrong side of the river, and that there will always be difficulty in getting sufficient water in the canal upon that side owing to the turn the river takes at the very point of the falls. At certain seasons of the year the water is so shallow in the canal that boats even of the lightest class cannot be got through it. It is therefore of the first importance to the commerce of that river that the canal shall either be enlarged or a new one commenced without further delay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask a question or two with regard to this resolution. I want to know whether it is contemplated to build two canals around the falls, one on each side of the river. This resolution, as it strikes me, means that two things are to be done: it first implies that a ship-canal is to be built at the expense of the Government on the Indiana side, and then that the one already begun on the Kentucky side is to be completed. It contemplates, if I understand it, that the General Government is to be at the expense—this is the beginning of it—of building two canals around the falls at that place. Is that the idea of the resolution?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I ask the Senator to explain what it does mean. Why want one made on this side?

Mr. MORTON. The object is to have estimates of the expense of building a canal around the falls of the Ohio river and an estimate and plan of completing, that is to say, of widening and deepening the canal already in existence on the Kentucky side, so that we may see which is the cheapest and which will be the best in the opinion of the engineer. Then it will be for Congress to determine what action it will take. In other words, the resolution now provides for preliminary surveys and estimates, and commits Congress to the construction of neither canal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the Senator by whom and under what direction the improvements now going on upon the Kentucky side are made?

Mr. MORTON. The existing canal belongs to a company which charges tolls for the passage of boats through it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So I supposed. If I recollect aright, that was originally undertaken on the Kentucky side by a company in conjunction with the United States, and after it had been built and used for a certain length of time the United States transferred all its interest to the company, passed it over into the hands of the company. I believe I am right in that. Now, they have been in the enjoyment of it for a long time, and it is proposed to enlarge it. It is perfectly manifest what this means. It is at the expense of the Government to make a survey, and then if the Government does not choose to build a canal on the Indiana side, it is to aid at least in completing that on the Kentucky side. Otherwise, why should a survey be made of that which is a private enterprise?

The Senator from Michigan stated this morning that it would cost nothing. Why, sir, it costs just so much money as it takes out of a fund already appropriated.

The remark that the people of the West would feel themselves neglected if this was not done, it seems to me, is hardly appropriate, when at this very session we have appropriated I do not know how much, but several million dollars for improvements in the West and the East, and I believe that out of those several millions there was not $500,000 which went anywhere but in the western States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not beyond Michigan.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Michigan and all the other western States. I do not know how much was appropriated for Ohio, but very considerable in Ohio. I do not know that it went beyond Michigan, but it went into that region. It is all very well; I dare say it is needed; but it hardly lies in the mouths of western gentlemen to say that the western people would feel themselves neglected if we did not undertake this additional work, especially after our legislation of this winter in relation to such matters.

Now, sir, I am unwilling to give any pledge on the subject, and I am unwilling to appropriate money for this purpose which has already been appropriated to be used for other purposes; but if those particularly interested in the subject choose to have it so, I do not know that it makes any great difference; but I should like to have a choice. I wish the Senator would strike out the words "and directed," so as to authorize the Secretary of War to do it if he thinks it expedient; but this resolution compels the Secretary of War to take the money that is appropriated for other purposes in the States of Michigan and Illinois and Indiana, &c., and appropriate it to this particular purpose. I do not think it would be wise to do that. The Senate, of course, will do what it sees fit on the subject.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I perceive by this resolution that it proposes to take the money necessary for the purposes contemplated by it out of the little appropriation of $100,000, which is all that has been appropriated for the purpose of improving the Ohio river from Pittsburg to its mouth, a distance of a thousand miles.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. It takes it out of another fund. The gentleman who introduced this bill in the House, and also had charge of the river and harbor bill, tells me that in that same law there was a specific appropriation for surveys, and we have provided by a supplementary law that five engineers may be employed for the purpose of making surveys. This resolution simply directs this to be done. So far as striking out the word "directed" and inserting the word "authorized" is concerned, there is no objection to that, except that it would render it necessary to send the resolution back to the House again. It has already passed the House unanimously. It is simply for the purpose of getting the judgment of the proper engineers of the Government upon the best mode of improving the Ohio river at the falls. I could go into a long disquisition to show the importance of it, but there is no time to do so now.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. That is already provided for by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not for a survey.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. A survey of all these rivers.

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am very much in favor of improving the Ohio river, and have been anxious for some years to get such a measure through Congress; but now, that at last we have got a little appropriation of $100,000, I do not want that to be taken and used for the improvement of these falls.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a specific appropriation made for the northwestern lakes and rivers, but it does not include the Ohio river.

I will state to the Senator from Maine that it is true that the Louisville and Portland canal is owned by a private company, and they are themselves, under an existing law, enlarging that. It has always been a matter of controversy as to whether it would not be cheaper and better to build a new work on a larger scale at Jeffersonville on the Indiana side, rather than on the Kentucky side. On the Kentucky side I am told they have to excavate rocks, while on the other side there would be no such necessity. I think it a proper case for a survey. The Government proposes by this resolution to go no further than simply making a survey. Whether the work shall hereafter be done by the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, or whether it shall be done by the assistance of appropriations by Congress, is a question which does not arise at all on this resolution. I am told that the resolution passed the House unanimously. The citizens of Cincinnati are very anxious about it, and I trust it will be granted. Probably the whole cost will not be $5,000. The whole of the falls is within three miles. The cost will be trifling.

Mr. CAMERON. I have not heard all the discussion on this subject, and therefore I may be wrong in my remarks; but I have a pretty good knowledge of the history of this canal. While I am in favor of doing anything that may be required for the improvement of the Ohio river, I am decidedly opposed to spending any money upon the canal, for the reason that I think it has been one of the most profitable investments in this country. No canal has made so much money to the stockholders as it has done. I will take it to-morrow, with all its cost, and make more money out of it than I could in any other investment that I know of. Whatever can be done for the improvement of the Ohio river should be done; but as regards these falls, another canal, in addition to the one now there, will be a most profitable investment; and when individuals make money out of the improvements of the country, I hold that it is wrong for this Government to invest its money in such enterprises. I have great respect for all the gentlemen of the West—

Mr. SHERMAN. I will simply inform my friend that this is not a proposition to aid the canal company at all. It simply authorizes the Government to ascertain certain facts, to examine the Indiana side and the Kentucky side, to make a survey.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand it now perfectly well. It is to make the Government of the United States pay for a survey there. I hold that the individuals owning that canal can afford to pay for surveys themselves.

Mr. SHERMAN. They will not make a survey on the Indiana side.

Mr. CAMERON. That is no reason why other individuals should not. I made myself, thirty-five years ago, at my own cost, a survey around the falls of the Ohio. It would not cost much money. It did not cost me more than two or three hundred dollars. I believe now that anybody who will go there and make a survey, and get the authority of the State of Indiana to enable him to make a canal around there, will make more money than in any other way in which the same amount of money could be expended.

Mr. CONKLING. Why do you not do it now?

Mr. CAMERON. If the State of Indiana will give me the authority to make a canal around there, I should be very willing to do it. But, sir, I object to the United States spending their money for the benefit of private individuals, no matter in what State the work may happen to be located. The object here is to get the Government of the United States to spend its money around these falls. I am perfectly willing to make an appropriation for the Ohio river. It is a great highway belonging to the whole nation, and I believe that at some future time a system of dams will be instituted there, as there ought to be in many other rivers in this country, which will make slack navigation from the mouth of the Ohio up to its source. There is plenty of water there. It will be the greatest improvement of the age in which it may be inaugurated. But I am in favor of having it done by individual subscriptions, by individual enterprise, without any appropriation from the Government. I might just as well ask for an appropriation around the falls of the Conewago in the Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania. We have falls there as great nearly as the falls of the Ohio, and we have an immense trade which would go up and down there if we could get those falls overcame.

Mr. MORTON. If it is right to require this survey to be made by individuals, it is a good argument why all the surveys of western rivers and harbors should be made by private individuals. It seems to me to be a new doctrine that has been brought forward for the occasion that private individuals shall make these surveys. I ask, what authority they would have with the Government when they were made? How much importance would be given to them in this Senate or by the Secretary of War? They would be entirely unofficial and valueless for any national purpose. The question of improving the navigation around the falls of the Ohio is a national question. The commerce there is of national, not local importance; and I think that the contrast is very strong between the cases the Senator puts of those little rivers in his State and the case of the navigation around the falls of the Ohio.

Now, sir, one word in regard to this canal. This is not to be done for the benefit of the canal company. We propose to have the opinion of the engineers as to how this improvement should be made, whether by enlarging that canal, or by building a canal on the Indiana side, or by both. Suppose it should be ascertained that the improvement should be made by enlarging that canal. The company refuse to do it. They are making a great deal of money. It is perhaps the best stock now in the western country; but still they object. They are making money enough, and they are not willing to invest another dollar in widening and deepening that canal. But I ask, how that answers the wants of commerce? I ask how the great commercial interests are to be subserved or to be made content by saying, "This company might do it," when the company will not do it? The company has not done it, and will not do it; but the interests of commerce are all the time suffering, and complaint has been made for years on this subject.

Now, sir, we simply want the opinions of the engineers to have surveys made, and have them made officially, as they are in a thousand cases where there is not a hundredth or a thousandth part of the interest involved that is involved in this case. It seems to me that there ought to be no opposition to this. Let the surveys be made; let them be submitted to Congress. Why, sir, suppose that Congress should determine that this canal itself ought to be widened and improved, the improvement made on the Kentucky side of the river, and that the nation should help, it will then be for us to say upon what terms we shall contribute to that improvement, not for the mere profit of that canal company, but for the interest and advantage of the commerce of the country. If a survey shall show that a canal should be located and dug on the Indiana side, then it will be for Congress to determine how it shall be done, and how much money shall be appropriated for that purpose. Sir, the importance of the work can hardly be overestimated.

Mr. DAVIS. The obstruction which those falls make to the navigation of the Ohio ought to be removed, and with a view to their removal this canal company was incorporated a great many years ago. Its stock was partly private and partly subscribed by the United States Government; I do not recollect the proportions. I was familiar with the concerns of that canal at one time; I am not at present. The dividends to the Government in the canal by act of Congress were set apart to purchase up the private stock and to make the canal free. That process continued, I know, for a considerable time, and until a large portion of the private stock was thus purchased for the Government, with a view ultimately to make the navigation of the canal free. I do not remember the point to which that process of purchasing up the private stock reached, or how much of the private stock remains still unbought; but I agree to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana that the navigation of that river at those falls ought to be free from the obstruction, whether by a canal on the Indiana or the Kentucky side or upon both sides.

I will make this further suggestion: that if it was necessary for the Government to open the navigation of that river, it could seize upon the canal company's stock, upon their property on the Kentucky side of the river, and widen the canal and make the locks of sufficient capacity for the transit of all boats, and could open the canal to the free navigation of the river. It would only be bound to purchase the private stock at what it was worth, and after purchasing the private stock at what it was worth the Government could then proceed to enlarge this canal and to enlarge the locks, and it ought to do so and make the navigation of the canal free. I hope that the survey contemplated by the resolution of the honorable Senator from Indiana will be ordered. It can do no harm. It will result in but a small expenditure of money, and it will give useful information to Congress upon which to base action on the whole subject.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator from Kentucky may be correct; but my recollection of its history is that somewhere about twenty years ago, when the canal was nearly free from debt and in a few years would have become free and a public highway, certain leading gentlemen got control of legislation, and in a hurry to get clear of everything that belonged to the Government the stock of the Government in the canal was sold for a trifle, and it became invested then entirely in individual purchasers. It is now private property, and I do not think we have any control over it.

My objection to this proposition now is that I look to a much greater improvement of the Ohio river than a mere improvement around the falls. As I said a moment ago, I look upon that river as a great highway from the East to the West, one which affects six or seven States materially. If we go into that improvement we ought to do it on a scale which will improve the whole river from its source to its termination. Therefore I want no money expended now around the falls of the Ohio, but am perfectly willing to vote for an appropriation, not only for a survey, but for the improvement of the Ohio from its mouth to its source in the Alleghany mountains. I do not believe that this money, if expended now, will do any good, except to give employment to a few individuals during the summer. My remembrance is that you cannot now take that stock from those people; but you may make another canal on the Indiana side, which I think the right side, and where it ought to have been made originally. A very small sum, comparatively, would keep the Ohio river free from that point down to its connection with the Mississippi; and I believe, by a system of dams above, it would have such a navigation as the world does not possess, for a sum of money so small that when once expended and the improvement completed, the whole country and the world would be astonished that it had not been done long years ago. Therefore I do not want anything done now in a small way which may hereafter stand in the way of the great improvement I have suggested.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Pennsylvania agrees as to the great importance of this work. He says it ought to have been done years ago; but he seems now to be opposed to authorizing a survey for the purpose of having the work done. Now, sir, I went before the Committee on Commerce just before the expiration of the last Congress and asked a small appropriation for the purpose of improving the only harbor that Indiana has upon Lake Michigan. A private company had been incorporated by the State of Indiana for the purpose of making the improvement; but we were met by the objection that there had been no surveys ordered by the Secretary of War and that there were no official data upon which such an appropriation could be made. If new surveys were made at these falls by private individuals and brought here, they would not be received and acted on. The Senate will only act on surveys made by official authority and which are known to be reliable.

I ask, sir, if this has not been the practice in regard to all these improvements of rivers and harbors? Why this discrimination? I am informed that the very last Congress appropriated nearly half a million dollars for the purpose of surveying and improving navigation around the falls of the Mississippi river or the rapids near Keokuk. Large appropriations, appropriations to the amount of $1,080,000, were made for the purpose of improving little harbors in the State of Michigan, some nineteen in number, all of them put together not embracing the thousandth part of the commerce that actually passes up and down the Ohio river past Louisville. Here is a work of great national importance, not a small local harbor upon the lake shore in Pennsylvania or Michigan or Indiana, but an improvement of national importance. The Senator from Pennsylvania agrees with me that it ought to have been done years ago, and it would then present the greatest channel of navigation in the world; but he is opposed to having the surveys made by authority and at the national expense, and says it ought to be done by private individuals. I submit that the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not hang together well. The national importance of this work, it seems to me, should at once silence every objection.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MONITOR CAMANCHE.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the iron-clad monitor Camanche, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNESS. I think the Senate will pass that resolution now if the case is stated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is better to let it lie on the table till the morning, so that we may look into it.

The joint resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 106.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 106) fixing the time at which the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, shall go into effect.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not mean to make any remarks on this bill. I desire to have simply a vote, an expression of the opinion of the Senate. This measure has the concurrence of the Senator who had the bankrupt bill in charge; not now a member of this body, but a member of the other House, who is prepared to advocate its passage in that House when it shall have passed this body. I trust, for the reasons suggested in the few remarks I made the other day, that the Senate will act upon it, and will give me a vote upon it without any further delay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I recollect rightly, this matter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I should like to hear from the members of that committee what the report was.

Several SENATORS. An adverse report.

Mr. JOHNSON. The committee reported adversely.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is due to myself to say I was not present when this bill was considered in committee. It was reported by one of the members of the committee adversely. I do not know what were the reasons. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] reported it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It ought not to be acted upon until we hear from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON. I concurred in the report, and I think all the members of the committee who were present also concurred in it. The honorable chairman was not present. I think it had better wait until the members of the committee come in.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Oh, no; give us a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. You may perhaps have a sufficient number to pass it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate is very thin, and it is too important a bill to be passed in this way without understanding something about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a very important bill; but it is a bill that simply carries into effect what the Senator from Maine and every other Senator thought the bankrupt bill was when it passed.

Mr. CONNESS. It does more than that.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does no more than that. It makes the bill take effect on the 1st of June, which is the time it was supposed the bill took effect when it passed; and it is not improper for me to name Judge POLAND, as that gentleman is no longer a member of the Senate, who has had charge of the bill, and to say that on receiving letters inquiring when the bill went into effect as it was not immediately printed, I asked him and he said on the 1st of June, and that it would be utter nonsense to give any other construction whatever to it, and that whatever a man might legally do before the bill passed he could do up to the 1st of June. But upon examining the bill afterward he found that he was mistaken. The reason of the mistake, I suppose, was this: the bankrupt bill passed the House more than a year ago to take effect at a certain time; it did not pass the Senate until that time had expired, and therefore it was necessary to alter the bill as to fixing the time of the law going into effect. I suppose in that way this misapprehension arose. It will be remembered that the previous bankrupt bill, that passed in 1841, did not take effect until six months after its passage, and preferences in assignments were prohibited for four months previous to an act of bankruptcy which could not be committed under that law within two months after its passage.

Mr. CONNESS. When this bill was referred to the committee there was a motion pending, made by myself, to strike out the last proviso. I now, before this vote is taken, as it is open to amendment yet, renew that motion to strike out the proviso. Then the bill will contain nothing but putting the law in operation on the 1st of June, and I shall have no objection to the passage of the bill in that shape. I said when the Senator from Rhode Island was up that it contains more than that. The Clerk will read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to strike out the last proviso.

The Secretary read the words to be stricken out, as follows:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith prior to the taking effect of this act.

Mr. JOHNSON. To strike out that provision would defeat the purpose of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course; that is all there is in it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The whole object of the bill is to accomplish what that proviso seeks to accomplish. In the absence of the member of the committee who had it specially in charge, I will state in a word why it was that we thought the bill should not pass with the proviso.

The act itself, which we have passed, was pending in Congress for a great while; it was passed on the 2d of March; it was therefore a law on that day in one sense. As far, however, as related to the authority of parties to apply for the benefit of it, it was postponed until the 1st of June. But the thirty-fifth section of the act did what as I think has been done in all antecedent laws of this description: it sought to avoid all preferences, which the law assumed to be illegal, made at any time within four months after an act of bankruptcy was discovered. If you say that all the conveyances which would be void if you were to let the law stand as it is that have been made four months before the 1st of June are to stand, it may be that so far as relates to persons who were bankrupt when the law passed, or became bankrupt at any time after the law passed, the general creditors would get nothing, but those bankrupts may, after they knew they were in a state of bankruptcy, have preferred special creditors.

Mr. ANTHONY. Could they not do that before the law was passed?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly they could do it before the law was passed; but they could not do it upon the theory upon which these laws exist. The law was passed in March; it is in one sense to go in operation in June. Now, you are about, if you pass this bill, to give effect to preferences made in the month of May and April and March, although the law was passed on the 2d of March.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the law stands it invalidates preferences made in February, although the act was not passed until March.

Mr. JOHNSON. It affects those made four months before the 1st of June.

Mr. ANTHONY. Four months before an act of bankruptcy, which may be on the 1st of June.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, what is done in this case is done under your tariff acts almost always. You frequently provide by your tariff acts that importations made under the existing tariff act, or rather in progress of being made, shall be subject to the additional duty.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator think that right?

Mr. JOHNSON. In one sense it is right; it depends upon the state of the country altogether. The policy of Congress for the last three or four years has been to pursue that course. That is much more objectionable, if it be objectionable at all, than a law which says that all a bankrupt's assets after he becomes bankrupt in point of fact shall be distributed equally, it being but equitable and just that in such a condition of things there should be that equality of distribution. If you pass this bill you defeat that in reference to all acts of bankruptcy where there have been preferences made at any time within four months prior to the 1st of June.

Mr. DRAKE. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island just now made a statement with regard to the effect of the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act which was made before; and I stated to the Senator who made it before in the previous discussion that it was a mistake. I desire now to state to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island again that upon an examination of that section he will discover his view of it to be a mistake. The proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island is that the section as it stands in the act is retroactive in its effect, so as to invalidate conveyances made in the month of February last, before the act was passed. A brief examination of the section, I think, will convince the honorable Senator that he is under a misapprehension on that point. The language of the section is:

That if any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months before the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, procures any part of his property to be attached, sequestered, or seized on execution, or makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, either directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, the person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or to be benefited thereby, or by such attachment, having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such attachment, payment, pledge, assignment, or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void.

It could not possibly be made "in fraud of the provisions of this act" until after the date of the passage of the act. It is impossible, therefore, that the view expressed by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, that this section invalidates transactions entered into in the month of February preceding the passage of the act, can be correct. It cannot be construed to invalidate transactions previous to the passage, for the language is that the "attachment, payment, pledge," &c., must have been "in fraud of the provisions of this act."

Mr. ANTHONY. Does it not say that the transaction shall be regarded as in fraud of the act?

Mr. DRAKE. No, sir; but—

"The person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or to be benefited thereby, or by such attachment" is to "have reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such attachment, payment, pledge, assignment, or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act."

According to the view taken by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, a man was required to take notice of a transaction in February being in fraud of the provisions of the act, before the act took effect! I think the gentleman will perceive in a moment that when the two things must combine and it must be found that the act done was in fraud of the provisions of the law, the time of the operation of that section cannot extend back beyond the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is now four o'clock. It is very evident that a matter of this importance ought not to be decided in so thin a Senate, especially when the Senator who has it in charge is not here to give the reasons for the report of the Judiciary Committee. I therefore again move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes."

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 103) constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 50) to furnish transportation of provisions to the destitute in the South.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the resolution relative to an adjournment of the present session, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. I. DONNELLY of Minnesota, and Mr. J. A. BINGHAM of Ohio, managers at the conference on its part.

EIGHT-HOUR LABOR SYSTEM.

The bill (H. R. No. 103) constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or in behalf of the Government of the United States, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I should think it ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I suggest that it should go to the Committee on Agriculture. That is the proper place for it.

Mr. WILSON. It ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, I think. It applies to Government works, to persons working in navy-yards, arsenals, and places of that character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be first put on the reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say just one word. If the question was how much money we should pay these people it would go to the Committee on Finance. Now, the question is, how much work they shall do for the money they get? It seems to me it should go to the same committee, and therefore I suggest that it should go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know what necessity there is in sending the bill to any committee? It contains a simple proposition. A Senator shakes his head, who has perhaps more competence than any other Senator within my sphere of observation for exact mental process, and this is a complicated proposition to that Senator as to whether a laboring man shall be required in Government employ to work eight or ten hours a day. Sir, there is not a man in the world who is not able to decide that instantly, much less the Senator who shakes his head at me. I have not named him.

Mr. WILSON. On which side are you?

Mr. CONNESS. I am for the bill. I am very proud to say that many years of my life have been spent in severe toil. My education, such as it is, was acquired pending that toil. I am one of those who believe—and I do not say this for the public ear—that toil is reputable; that it is ennobling; that it lends true courage. I believe that the toilers, after all, are the men upon whom every society that is well ordered has to rely. I know that in the great war through which our country has been saved and the immutable principles upon which it is organized have been preserved for our and the world's uses, we had to rely upon the arms made strong by toil; that whenever by the process of law we demanded that citizens not so connected, not so educated, not so used, should fill their part of soldier to the Republic, they begged themselves off, they bought themselves off, they stole themselves off, from the field of battle and contest.

Mr. President, I said once before in the Senate, and perhaps it will bear repeating, that when I saw the column of Burnside, thirty thousand or forty thousand strong, marching through this city to the sanguinary fields between the Wilderness and Richmond and Coal Harbor inclusive, and stood where I could see the eye of every man in the column, I saw scarcely any but those who had the marks of toil and stalwart labor, black and white; and if I never before that time revered the men who labor, I should do it beginning at that period of my life; but it was not necessary for me to begin then.

Now, Mr. President, there is a considerable agitation in this country upon this question of whether a day's labor shall be constituted of eight or ten hours; and I have no doubt there are those who think that if this bill be passed, and the example be set by the Government, the eight-hour rule will follow in other industries conducted in the country. Well, sir, I hope it will. A personal experience enables me to say that I could myself perform more labor in eight hours than in ten, taking any given week for the average, and then it gave me more hours of study. Many and many a morning, at two o'clock, when I labored ten and eleven hours a day in my youth, found me yet endeavoring to enable myself to take my rank among my fellows in society; and I desire by my vote and voice, if that can influence any one, to give an equal opportunity to the youths of the land connected with labor and toil. Let no man forget, because his task is made easy in this world, the thousands, the tens of thousands, and the hundreds of thousands who labor and toil for an ill-requited compensation, for a small compensation, scarcely sufficient to furnish bread, much less to enable them to educate their children and bring them up fit to be citizens of this Republic. Make their path as easy as you can by limiting their hours of labor. Give them time to think.

Mr. President, I have some feeling on this subject. I had contemplated introducing such a bill myself; but I was not anxious to put myself forward in it. I have no desire to win any credit from abroad on the subject, God knows that. But I do ask the Senate to pass this bill, and to set the example to the laboring citizens of this Republic, the patriotic men of blood and muscle. Give them the freedom from toil of two hours less than they now are compelled to perform. I ask Senators to do it. It is not necessary to refer the bill. We all understand it. Let us do ourselves credit by passing it at once.

Mr. WILSON. I moved the reference of this measure to the Committee on Naval Affairs, not to defeat its passage, but for the reason that if it was to be referred at all, that the Naval Committee was the appropriate one. Suggestions were made all around me to refer it to committees that should not have the care of it, and I wished it to go to the committee to which is referred matters pertaining to the navy-yards where are employed thousands of mechanics and workmen.

Mr. CONNESS. There is not any reason it should be referred at all.

Mr. WILSON. I agree with the Senator from California that there is no need of reference at all—we all know just what the proposition is—it has been discussed before the country. All may not concur in the wisdom of the measure; but all of us know the purport, scope, and meaning of this measure. I asked the Senator from California how he intended to vote, for I wished him to declare himself.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator ought to have been Yankee enough to guess how I should vote.

Mr. WILSON. I did guess; but I wanted the Senator to speak out, as he did, for the passage of the bill. I, too, shall vote for it, for I have been for two or three years in favor of making the experiment. With an earnest desire to adopt the policy most conducive to the permanent interests of the workmen of the country, I have, I confess, been unable to solve this eight-hour question satisfactory to my own reason and conscience. Upon these questions that so deeply concern the enduring interests of the toiling masses of our countrymen I would act after careful consideration. I give on this, as on other questions touching the rights and interests, the elevation and improvement of the toiling men of our country, my doubts in favor of the dependent, the less favored portion of the people. I am ready, at any rate, to try in the public works the experiment, and if it shall fail, we shall speedily discover it; but if it shall answer the high-raised expectations of its friends, incalculable good will be achieved. In voting for this measure, neither the Senator from California nor myself have anything to gain.

Mr. CONNESS. We cannot help that.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; we cannot help that; but I am ready, as I am sure the honorable Senator is on this as on some other occasions, to incur censure and bear the burden of reproach and hostility. I vote for the measure without reference, and in the hope that it will, if passed, be productive of blessings and benefits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will not be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion for a reference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I renew it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance, where it properly belongs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other question is not decided yet. The Senator from Massachusetts asks to withdraw his motion, which he can do by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and it is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance. That is the proper reference, where it should go to be considered. I wish to say a single word on this subject, not to go into the merits of the bill. I entirely agree to what my friend from California has said: first, that manual labor is necessary to courage; second, that it is necessary to intelligence and being trusted in public affairs; and third, as he has demonstrated, that it is not inconsistent with eloquence. Nevertheless, it is quite a problem to know whether you can justly get ten hours' pay for eight hours' work, and that is a question for the Committee on Finance to decide, and I hope it will go there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that this bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays. ["No!" "No."] It is near the end of the session, otherwise I would not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the call withdrawn?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to state a fact on this subject. By the law we are obliged to pay our laborers in the different positions where they may be employed precisely the same sums that are paid outside for similar labors. The result of this will be, if we pass it without knowing what it is outside, that we shall pay for eight hours' work as much as anybody else pays for ten; and I think it is pretty well demonstrated that from the laborers in the Government employ you do not get more than two thirds as much work as you do from those in private employ as it stands now.

Mr. CONNESS. It must be considered, I think, that a reference at this time to a committee is a defeat of the measure at this session.

Mr. CAMERON. I know something about workmen, and I prefer having this bill sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs, for the reason that the Navy employs a great many workmen. If I had the power to do as I wish in this matter I would compel the Government to employ everybody by the hour and pay a fixed sum for each hour that a man worked; so that a man of enterprise and a man of industry could better his condition. I am not in favor of fixing any particular hours during which men shall be compelled to work or by which the idle shall get an excuse for leaving their work. I would encourage labor in every way, so as to induce every man to be industrious. In the main I approve of everything said by the intelligent Senator from California. That labor is necessary to the prosperity of the country we all admit. We ought to encourage the laborer in every way we can. I do not think we shall do so by fixing a small or a large number of hours during which he shall be compelled to work for a particular sum. The more you encourage the enterprise and the courage of men, by so much more do you increase their intelligence and their usefulness. I think by sending this bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs some measure will be brought forward which will be a benefit to the laboring men, and I am for benefiting them in every way I can.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to state one other fact for the consideration of Senators, and that is that it has been found in England, demonstrated I think very satisfactorily, that the effect of trades unions fixing hours of labor and all that, and compelling everybody to come to them, has been confessedly to reduce able men, men of capacity and ambition, to the level of the poorest. That is the effect of that system. It works against the industrious, against the enterprising, against those who want to better their condition by their work. If you put it precisely in this way it is simply reducing them all to the same level.

Mr. CONNESS. I will not extend this debate. I wish to say, in the first place, that there is a very great difference between the laboring people of America and the laboring people of England, a difference that I hope will continue as long as the Republic shall last. The trades unions of England and of this country to the extent that they exist here, and they do exist here, have not the hours of labor under their consideration as much as the wages to be paid for labor. There are no trades unions in America that fix the hours of labor, or have ever undertaken to do so; but they do undertake to fix the wages of labor.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is a mistake.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator says it is a mistake.

Mr. SPRAGUE. A very great mistake.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I will modify my statement to the extent the Senator suggests. I have never known of any, and I have been acquainted with their movements to a very considerable extent. I will say here, however, that I never belonged to any. I never had any confidence in that mode of dealing with the question. My mode, on the contrary, and that which I advised, was the education of themselves by themselves, thus lending dignity and intelligence to their labor and making themselves a necessity to employers, thus rendering themselves independent of employers. That was my advice when I was in a position to have any to give. But the reference of this measure now to the Committee on Finance is its defeat undoubtedly; a reference of it to the Committee on Naval Affairs would be worse still, because the chairman of that committee is not here, and that committee does not meet for business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it will keep until the next session. I wish simply to say to the Senator that I suppose he will admit there is one point of resemblance between the laborers of England and the laborers of America, and that is, there is a difference between them, some of them are better than others and more capable; and that is enough for my argument.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Backalew, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Crazin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelighuysen, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Conkling, Conness, Dixon, Fowler, Harlan, Morton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Davis, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Morgan, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sumner, Thayer, and Willey—18.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

TRANSPORTATION OF PROVISIONS SOUTH.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 50) to furnish transportation of provisions to the destitute in the South was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there be no objection, that resolution ought to be passed now if it is to be passed at all. It passed unanimously in the House. I have a letter here stating that a vessel—

Mr. JOHNSON. What is it about?

Mr. SHERMAN. To authorize a Government vessel to carry provisions exclusively to the South in pursuance of the resolution we have already passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of the Navy, upon the application of the contributors, or of any person on their behalf, to charter a vessel to convey provisions contributed by the people from Baltimore, Maryland, to Wilmington, North Carolina, for gratuitous distribution among the destitute of the South, under the direction of the contributors and such regulations as may be by the Secretary of the Navy be prescribed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of watchmen, and for other purposes, have directed me to report it without amendment, and recommend its passage.

Several SENATORS. It is time to adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that the communication from the House will be taken from the table and considered.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his motion for a moment to allow the message from the House to be read and acted upon.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is that?

Mr. DRAKE. Asking for a committee of conference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We do not want a committee of conference.

Several SENATORS. Yes, we do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not until that matter is disposed of.

Mr. DRAKE. I trust we shall not adjourn—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No argument upon the subject is in order.

Mr. DRAKE and Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, but was interrupted by—

Mr. SHERMAN. By general consent, as I understand Senators are willing to have the question taken, I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, with a view to have a committee of conference appointed on the adjournment question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by common consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to any such arrangement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call will proceed.

The calling of the roll was concluded, and the result announced—yeas 9, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Fowler, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Trumbull, and Wilson—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Cole, Corbett, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sumner, and Willey—19.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution of the House on the subject of adjournment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would inquire which resolution the Senator refers to?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I mean the one on which there is a disagreement between the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from the House of Representatives on that subject.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 28, 1867.

Resolved, That the House do concur in the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution relative to the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. SCHENCK, Mr. DONNELLY, and Mr. BINGHAM be the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that resolution will not be taken up for consideration. We have a clean resolution from the House, which they sent here to-day, proposing an adjournment very similar to that which the Senate has passed. I believe it fixes two periods for a conditional meeting of Congress instead of one, which is not very important. I think if we are to have these supposed opportunities to assemble we may as well have two of them as one. Hardly any one anticipates, I judge, that there will be any session of Congress at either of those periods.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only question is upon the appointment of a committee of conference. That is the shortest way to get at it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think not. If we agree to the resolution they have sent us to-day there is an end of it.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to have that resolution read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution referred to by the Senator from New York will be read.

The Secretary read the House resolution received to-day, proposing an adjournment from Friday, March 29, at three p. m., to Wednesday, June 5, and from thence to Wednesday, September 4, unless a quorum should be present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the objection to that if we are going to adjourn in that way at all?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not see any.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The substantial difference between the two resolutions is that one fixes only one period of meeting and the other two, and they are both of them in hot weather, unpleasant weather. I think the less of this sort of nonsense, for I cannot characterize it as much else, the better, and therefore I prefer the proposition as it now stands between the two Houses with respect to which the House of Representatives have asked a conference; and I move accordingly that we insist upon our amendment and agree to the conference.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope that motion will not prevail. If the motion was simply to insist upon our amendment I should be glad to vote for it. I do not know why we should commit to six gentlemen the business of adjusting just as they please this whole matter of adjournment. It has been discussed here a great deal; everybody in either branch has had a full opportunity of expressing his views; and I do not know now, after expending all this time, why it should be committed to six managers to determine a question so simple as this, involving a single point. I can readily understand how a conference between these gentlemen might lead to fixing a session of Congress in the fall, or some other time, which in my estimation would be very inconvenient and very unwise; and I do not want to find myself in the attitude to-morrow, when the time is all gone, of voting against the entire report of a conference committee, or else accepting such details as they see fit to fix it. Now, I ask, whatever may be the mode of getting at it—and I will thank the Chair to inform me on that point—that we have an opportunity of voting separately from the question of agreeing to a conference upon the question of insisting upon our amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to lay this pending proposition from the House on the table with a view of taking up the other resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe I am entitled to the floor; and I wish the Chair would be kind enough to inform me whether under this motion I can have a separate vote upon the proposition to insist upon our amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose that can be done.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I ask for a division of the question, to the end that we may insist upon our amendment; or I will submit a motion that the Senate insist.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senator from New York will vary his motion so that it shall be that the Senate adhere, and not appoint a committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the President would have it in his power to adjourn us.

Mr. CONKLING. No, I beg pardon of the Senator from Ohio. The President would not have it in his power to adjourn us unless by an act of usurpation; because unless the House adheres following a vote to adhere on our part, which would put it in his power, he would have no such power. I submit that we are just as much exposed to-night as we should be to-morrow after we vote to adhere. Then I move on the suggestion of my friend from Vermont, if that is the proper form, that we adhere to our amendment. I am told—I will mention it if there is no objection to my stating it—that there is very little doubt that upon our adhering the House will recede, and that will produce precisely the effect which this body has voted over and over again its disposition to produce; whereas if we get a conference committee, nobody knows precisely, composed as the committee on the part of the House will be, where it will land us. We have this now in our own keeping, and my impression is that we had better retain it in our hands.

Mr. CONNESS. I only rise to say that I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to lay the pending matter now before the Senate upon the table, with a view to take up the other resolution sent by the House.

Mr. CONKLING. That is not in order now. Why not vote on this now?

Mr. DRAKE. I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask this question: the House having resolved not to concur in our amendment, if we then resolve to adhere, does not that form a disagreement on which the President can adjourn us?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all; absolutely not, by parliamentary rules, which nobody can misunderstand.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to say to Senators that a motion to adhere is never made in parliamentary practice until after two motions to insist, and to do it is considered as hostile to the other House.

Mr. CONKLING. Then take it in the form of insisting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is to lay the matter on the table. That is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes eleven, noes not counted.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, that my action may not be misunderstood, I will say that I adopted the form of a motion to adhere on the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] If any Senator thinks that implies a hostile animus to the other House (which I did not suppose) I now ask that the vote be taken on the simple motion to insist, without the addition of agreeing to a committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, you ask a division of the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have never known a case where we insisted without at the same time agreeing to the conference proposed, especially if one was asked by the other House. If we pursued such a course in this case I think it must certainly be regarded as a hostile act. It has always been customary during the ten years I have been in the body to include a motion for a conference in the same vote that insists.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is only a division of the question; both motions are pending.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to understand what is to be gained by insisting? Has not this thing gone backward and forward enough already?

Mr. SHERMAN. Everybody agrees that we ought to insist, and then the question will be at once put on ordering a committee of conference. It is only a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division being called for, the first question is on insisting.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us understand this for a moment. Undoubtedly a motion for a conference committee would be in order, just as a great many other motions would be in order. I suppose there is as little doubt that if a conference committee was not ordered the House would be informed that the Senate insists and does not agree to the conference, and then the question with the House would be whether they would recede from their disagreement. That is all there is about it. Therefore, do not let Senators suppose that if we vote to insist that therefore implies that we are going to appoint a conference committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. But a motion to insist and appoint a conference committee has been made. That is the motion pending. The Senator asks for a division of the question. As a matter of course he can have the division. I supposed at first that that was not a divisible question; but the Chair rules otherwise. The question is first put on insisting, and then it must be put on the conference.

Mr. CONKLING. All I say is that the vote on the question of insisting does not bind us to appoint a committee of conference.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["No, no."]

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion that the Senate insist on its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I now move that a committee of conference be appointed in accordance with the request of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That motion is already pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a part of the original motion which was divided. The question now is on agreeing to the request of the House of Representatives for a conference on the disagreeing votes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am led to believe that there is no serious difference between the Senate and the House in reference to this matter of adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The conferees will soon find that out. The quickest way to get at it is to have a committee of conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am anxious to adjourn, but I think the wisest course for the Senate to take is to agree to this committee of conference; and I am satisfied that if we refuse the request of the House, it will be regarded not only as somewhat unprecedented—

Mr. FESSENDEN. We did it last session upon an important bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know we did; and then it was asserted, perhaps with truth, that there was no precedent in the history of our legislation for an act of that kind, as I am advised by good authority. But there is now that one precedent. That precedent ought not to be followed, as it seems to me. If I was a member of the House, and I had respectfully requested a conference with the Senate on this question, and the Senate flouted the proposition back into my face, I think I should stand by my resolution and throw the responsibility upon the Senate. I believe the House will do it in this instance, and the consequence will be that the House will occupy one position and the Senate another. I do not know whether the President would interfere or not; but if he did not the result would be that we should be kept here in session and should not reach any adjournment. Every one knows that I am opposed to all these arrangements about intermediate sessions, from beginning to end.

Mr. CONNESS. You will get one if you agree to a conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I expect to get it any way. I see it is probably inevitable.

Mr. CONNESS. That is a bad confession.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that it is a bad confession. I am willing to confess the truth at any time. When it is apparent to me that certain facts are true I see no use in denying them. I merely rose to suggest that it seems to me advisable that we agree to this committee of conference, and not undertake to stand here stubbornly upon what we have done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference requested by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore, being authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, Messrs. EDMUNDS, FESSENDEN, and HOWARD were appointed.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 28, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases; when the Speaker signed the same.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS IN MARYLAND.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House for reference resolutions of a convention held yesterday in the city of Baltimore.

Mr. THOMAS. I call for the reading of the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Whereas the Legislature of Maryland has, since the adjournment of this Republican State convention on the 27th of February, passed the convention bill, in regard to which this convention has already in previous resolutions declared its judgment, and this convention is now reassembled as provided for by its fifth resolution on the contingency of the passage of said convention bill: Therefore,

Resolved, That we return our thanks to the Republican members of the General Assembly for their memorial to Congress, presented to that body on the 25th of March, and this convention, in behalf of the majority of the people of Maryland, appeal hereby to the Congress of the United States to grant the request of that memorial.

Resolved, That we call upon Congress to protect the loyal majority of the people of Maryland, both white and colored, in defeating the scheme of the revolutionists in the Legislature, and to aid us in forming and to guaranty to us by acts of Congress a republican State government on the basis of impartial manhood suffrage.

Resolved, That we will oppose any new constitution set up in subversion of the existing constitution under the convention bill which does not express the will of the majority of the people without regard to color, and that we will, with the aid of the loyal representatives of the nation, and by all means in our power, resist and destroy any such constitution as a revolutionary usurpation.

Resolved, That we will take no part in the approaching election for delegates to a constitutional convention further than to recommend a general vote of the Republicans of the State against the call for a convention, and to use every lawful means in their power to defeat the call.

Resolved, That should the call be sustained by a majority of the voters, that the State central committee, on ascertaining that result, issue a call for district meetings, to be held in every election district in the State, for the choice by ballot, on the basis of universal manhood suffrage, of delegates to a State constitutional convention, each county and the city of Baltimore to elect the number to which they may be entitled under the present constitution of the State.

Resolved, That said State constitutional convention, if called, shall assemble in the city of Baltimore on the first Wednesday in June, and proceed to form a constitution based on universal manhood suffrage.

Resolved, That courage, wisdom, and action are all that is necessary to success. And we call on the tried Union veterans of the State, who have been hardened by the conflicts of six years of battle and agitation, to fly high the banner of liberty and Union, and know no end but victory."

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, are those resolutions before the House?

The SPEAKER. They are before the House for reference. The reading of them was called for by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS.]

Mr. WOOD. Are the proceedings of partisan political meetings permitted to come before the House in this way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in the habit of laying before the House any resolutions which are sent to him for presentation to the House. It is for the House to determine what shall be done with them.

Mr. WOOD. I have here the proceedings of a meeting held in the city of New York, expressing indignation at the action of the Republicans in our Legislature in refusing to allow suffrage to the colored population of our State. Unless those proceedings are to be permitted to come in I shall object to the introduction of these now presented from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The proceedings to which the gentleman refers have not, so far as the Chair is aware, been sent to the Speaker for presentation to the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to say that I have here resolutions (which I have been requested to present) calling upon Congress to "reconstruct" New Hampshire, because that State prohibits Catholics from holding office.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is obliged to rule that the remarks of both the gentlemen from New York [Mr. WOOD and Mr. ROBINSON] are not germane to these resolutions, on which the gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, there are some circumstances connected with these papers which distinguish them from the class of papers to which the gentlemen from New York have referred. There is prevalent in Maryland an intense excitement, not tending, in my humble judgment, in the direction spoken of yesterday in my absence by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. WOOD. I am reluctant to interrupt the gentleman from Maryland; but the introduction of these resolutions has been objected to.

Mr. THOMAS. The resolutions were presented by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions were presented by the Chair. The gentleman from New York can, if he desires, raise the question of reception. If that question be raised the Chair, under the rules, must submit it to the House.

Mr. WOOD. I was under the impression that my friend from Maryland had presented the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presented them, having been requested to do so.

Mr. WOOD. If I understand the ruling of the Chair, political meetings can send their proceedings to the Speaker, and he has the privilege of laying them before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not anticipate the decision of points which may arise hereafter, but would indicate very decidedly that when resolutions are sent to him by any organization of any importance in the country he will respectfully submit them to the House. When the question of the reception of such papers is raised, that question is to be decided by the House, not by the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. The presentation of these papers by the Presiding Officer took me as much by surprise as it can have taken any other member on this floor. I was not aware that the paper was in the custody of the Speaker. There is no concert between the Presiding Officer and myself.

As I have said, and I reiterate it, there are circumstances surrounding this paper which distinguish it eminently from ordinary memorials which come before the Congress of the United States. There is prevalent in Maryland intense excitement on this subject, not tending as I hope, and certainly will not tend under any admonition of mine, in the direction spoken of by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yesterday; for I would not have this contrariety of opinions, in a well organized and civilized community like Maryland, lead to bloodshed. I anticipate a pacific solution of our difficulty.

If the House will indulge me, as I do not often intrude in its deliberations, I will refer to the origin of the difficulties in Maryland. They all grow out of circumstances existing before existing parties were organized. The constitution of Maryland was adopted in 1776. At that time nearly the whole of the population of Maryland was located on the borders of the Chesapeake, upon the eastern and western shores of that bay. The representation in our Legislature was apportioned with reference to population. In the constitution they adopted our fathers inserted a provision authorizing the Legislature of Maryland by amendment of that constitution so as to adapt it to the changing circumstances and location and population of the State. That power the Legislature of Maryland have uniformly refused to exercise. They had authority under the old constitution to pass a law and have it submitted to the people at the polls; if the next Legislature thought proper to sanction that act, it would have constituted a part of the constitution, but having the power they forgot that which was right. They held on to that distribution until a vast majority of the population of Maryland was on one side, and nearly the whole power, legislative, executive, and judicial, on the other.

I utterly deny here—I have denied it for thirty years of my life—that there is a republican Government in Maryland. This tyranny and oppression no free people ought to submit to.

Let me speak of these inequalities a little in detail. There are one hundred and fifty thousand, I suppose—I speak in round numbers, for I speak without premeditation or research—there are about one hundred and fifty thousand free white inhabitants located in these fifteen counties of Maryland where settlements were first made, while there are in other parts of the State five hundred thousand. These counties with one hundred and fifty thousand free white inhabitants have fifteen members of the Senate of Maryland out of twenty-four, nearly two thirds of that body. No law can be passed by that body without the consent of this one fifth. No law can be repealed without the consent of this one fifth part of Maryland.

They have exercised their power in another respect. Of the thirty-one Governors of Maryland these fifteen counties, with this one fifth of the population, have had twenty-four, dividing them between counties on the eastern and the counties of the western shores of the Chesapeake. The great country I represent has never had an opportunity to elect a Governor except on two occasions. If to the population and wealth of these counties we add the population and wealth of the great city of Baltimore, with two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, we have a community who have been permitted to elect from their midst, I think, only seven chief magistrates. The same injustice has prevailed with reference to the selection of Senators of the United States. We have a law of Maryland, a law enacted by that dominant interest of which I have spoken, which secures one of the two Senators of the United States to the eastern shore of Maryland, which section forms only one of our five congressional districts; and the other Senator of the United States to which Maryland is entitled has been, except in four or five instances, taken from the other seven counties, which, with the eight counties of the eastern shore, make the fifteen counties of which I have spoken.

The same selfishness and injustice has characterized this minority government in Maryland on subjects of legislation. I will not pause to point out numerous instances; I will name one only. The school funds of the State, contributed to the treasury mainly from western Maryland and the city of Baltimore, is under control of this Legislature, and has been distributed to the people of the several counties without regard to population. Three thousand white inhabitants in one of the dominant counties were for a long time in the receipt of as large a portion of this fund for educational purposes as the forty-five thousand in one of the counties of which I am the Representative, and as large a portion as the population of Baltimore.

Under such a government the majority cannot rule in any of its departments. No matter how fixed, calm, deliberate, and unalterable may be that will of the majority, it can neither prevail in the legislative, executive, nor judicial departments of the government. Is such a government to be deemed republican in this age? Can gentlemen who surround me, and whose thoughts can go back to the character of their own State institutions, and compare them with the institutions as I have thus rapidly sketched, and tell me they are republican in form?

Why, sir, one of the principles of republicanism which I suppose we will all assent to is that the calm, deliberate, unchanging, inflexible purpose of the majority must at some time or other pervade all branches of the Government. We of Maryland do not want that sudden ebullition and uprising of the majority of the community to be carried into effect and make the law of the land as in the old mobocracy of Greece. We desire the distribution of power, and we know our fathers took the precaution to give to the minority reasonable protection, while they intended that the majority should, by gradual, persistent effort, have power to remove every obstacle in their pathway to power. Never was it intended that the minority should have perpetual domination over the majority. I utterly deny it, and my whole heart and soul has been up in arms in rebellion against this State government of Maryland, no matter to what political association I may happen to be attached, whether I am with the party out of power or a member of the great party which fortunately for the country, has its destinies in its hands.

This power, thus unjustly distributed and exercised under the old constitution of Maryland, has been partially taken away. Agitation after agitation has wrought changes in our State. In 1850 there was a partial rectification of this evil. The representation from the lower counties of Maryland in the Legislature was diminished, and that of the counties from whence I came increased, as well as that of the city of Baltimore. The power to elect a Governor by joint ballot of the Legislature was taken away and was given to the people. The same convention, in other respects, ameliorated the condition of things in Maryland.

In 1864 another convention was held, and again a small portion of that power was taken away from the southern counties and was given to Baltimore and the more populous counties of the State.

Now, sir, what happened recently in the legislation of Maryland? I speak of it with regret. No man wants peace in our own borders more than I, and no man tolerates more differences of political opinion. But that is not reciprocated. The party temporarily in power, this minority of the people in the lower counties, aided by the treachery of the Governor, in order to augment their power, have now boldly presented to the people a call for a constitutional convention, for or against which they are called upon to vote; as a basis of which new constitution they propose that twelve more members of the Legislature shall be given to the lower section of Maryland than they have under the constitution of 1864. The people of the State are up in arms against such a monstrous proposition. We have borne it long enough, patiently, peaceably, submissively, beyond what becomes a free people.

Then, sir, what are we to do? That is the question. Unless something is done by Congress the proposed convention in Maryland will be held, in which a constitution will be adopted aggravating our evils.

And here let me, by way of interpolation, say that in my statement of the relative population of the different sections of the State I have ignored altogether the black population. There are two hundred thousand blacks, who are of course excluded from participation in the right of government in any degree. I have only run the parallel between the white people of one section and of another.

But I say we are powerless unless Congress interposes. And has Congress that power? The United States have power to guaranty a republican form of government to all the States of the Union. Congress is clothed with the power of passing such laws as may be necessary to execute this power and all powers granted by the Constitution. That, in my humble judgment, covers this whole question. With this power to guaranty a republican form of government we acquire the power first to enable the people concerned to create such a government.

How is Congress to exercise that power? By an enabling act. The people of Maryland should not be left there to struggle in the manner proposed now in these resolutions; they should not be left there to resort to physical power to enable the one party or the other to hold power in the State. They are a law-abiding population, and they apply to Congress to provide and guaranty them a republican form of government.

I did not intend to go into this subject at length, coming up as it did so unexpectedly. But I will remind gentlemen of another fact in connection with the present condition of affairs in Maryland. We all know what this movement in Maryland is aimed at. All over Maryland, with few exceptions, loyal men are in the judgeships, the clerkships, and registers' offices. Now, the party in power in Maryland have utterly abrogated that article of our Constitution which excludes from the exercise of the right of suffrage that portion of the population of Maryland who went South during the rebellion and took part against the Government of the United States. They thus increase immensely their numerical force in the State.

And now they propose to hold a convention in which they propose to admit twelve more members to those counties in the southern portion of the State than they rightfully are entitled to under the present constitution of that State. And they also give the right to vote to all those in the State of Maryland who went South during the rebellion, but have now returned, with the design of removing from position every loyal officer in Maryland.

Now, will gentlemen for a moment look at the situation of the State of Maryland in relation to the seat of Government of the United States. That State touches the Potomac river both above and below the District of Columbia, and as long as this continues to be the seat of Government this Government cannot be administered without crossing the territory of the State of Maryland. Your mails, your telegraphic dispatches from the heads of the Army and Navy must cross the territory of that State. No member of Congress can come here to take his seat without crossing the territory of Maryland; and is it unreasonable to expect that the Congress of the United States, which has expended so much blood and treasure to rescue one section of the Union from the political domination held by those plotting the overthrow of the Government; is it to be expected that Congress will hesitate to exercise the unquestioned power conferred upon it under the Constitution to rescue Maryland from the hands of persons as thoroughly disloyal and hostile to this Government at this moment as are any in the States further South?

Sir, I take a bolder ground than that even. I hold that were the Constitution silent upon the subject, so absolutely necessary and indispensable is the soil of Maryland to the proper administration of this Government, a power inherent in this Government as a Government would exist to seize, occupy, and establish there institutions in accord with the known wishes and purposes of the people, and the safety and security of the Government itself. Having made these few remarks—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Before the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] takes his seat, will he allow me to address an inquiry to him?

Mr. THOMAS. With great pleasure.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I had not the pleasure of hearing all the remarks which the gentleman from Maryland has addressed to the House upon this subject; but from those I did hear, it seems to me that he claims the existence of a most monstrous power on the part of this Government. But as I may be mistaken in regard to what the gentleman has claimed, I desire to inquire of him if he claims that the Federal Government is armed with original power to reform the constitution of a State, which constitution may have existed at the time when the Federal Government itself was created? I would also ask him whether the constitutions of the States which formed our Federal Constitution were not republican in form, and whether the nation has grown and increased in power so that it may now say to the States that their constitutions are not republican? Is that the power given by the clause of the Constitution to the Federal Government to guaranty to each State a republican form of government?

Mr. THOMAS. If the gentleman had heard my opening remarks he would have seen that I have already anticipated the very question he has propounded. The constitution of Maryland was republican in form, so thoroughly republican that it came up even to the standard of republicanism of this day, for it gave to every free man, black as well as white, the right alike to a qualified vote. But I have tried to possess the House with this fact that that constitution has now grown to be anti-republican in form, and those who now control the government will not follow the example of our fathers, and conform the institutions of the State to the requirements of the age and the location and condition of the people.

They hold a power given to them by men who had respect for republican principles. They hold that power, but they will not exercise it. They not only cling on to the unjust political preponderance which they now enjoy, but they propose to give twelve more Representatives to that favored section of the State in the proposed convention which has so long enjoyed privileges and immunities altogether unjust.

I have already explained this subject, and it seems to me any gentleman who has heard me ought to see at a glance that a government which was once republican has grown to be anti-republican by the usurpation of those in whose hands this instrument has been unfortunately placed.

I move that these resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, if anything on earth could have surprised me, though I have almost learned to follow uniformly the Horatian rule, nil admirari—to wonder at nothing—it would have been what we have witnessed this morning, the extraordinary presentation of a partisan memorial and the extraordinary speech of the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] against his own State and the constitution of his State, and the more extraordinary principles which he has laid down as constitutional law for the adoption and guidance of the younger generation of this country. Sir, if this is a consolidated Government and if all powers are vested here in the Congress of the United States, I propose to ask the honorable gentleman from Maryland to look not only at the constitution of his own State, but the constitutions of other States and the Constitution of the Federal Government itself, and ask whether anywhere, with very few exceptions, a republican government exists in any one State of the Union. I will begin with the easternmost State, the State of Maine, from which I came originally. In that State there is no equality of representation in the Legislature. The larger towns are to a great extent disfranchised. The preponderance of population in the cities is utterly disregarded in the representation, and thus, if mere numbers constitute a Republic, there is no republicanism in Maine.

I will pass over Massachusetts for the present, and look to the State of Connecticut. There is no equality of representation whatever in the State of Connecticut. Towns like New Haven and Hartford, the largest cities and towns of the State, have no equality whatever in representation; no more equality than there is in the State of Maryland. I ask the honorable gentleman from Maryland whether, when he proposes that Congress shall give a republican constitution to Maryland, he proposes that the two States of Maine and Connecticut shall have the go-by—

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman, I trust, will allow me to interrupt him to correct an error into which he has fallen in regard to the State of his nativity and of my adoption.

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. The inequality of which the gentleman speaks does not exist. The relative representation of the different counties in Maine is apportioned entirely upon the basis of population.

Mr. BROOKS. But has Portland its equality of representation?

Mr. BLAINE. The respective counties are entitled to their just share of representation according to population.

Mr. BROOKS. Do the people of Bangor enjoy an equality of representation?

Mr. BLAINE. With regard to all the rest of the State they do.

Mr. BROOKS. Do they enjoy an equality of representation in the lower branch of the Legislature?

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman does not understand me. The popular representation is apportioned among the various counties precisely upon the basis of population.

Mr. BROOKS. I will ask the gentleman, to how many representatives is the city of Portland entitled in the Legislature?

Mr. BLAINE. Four.

Mr. BROOKS. And what is the population of Portland?

Mr. BLAINE. Thirty thousand. But Cumberland county, in which Portland is situated, enjoys, in her share of representation, the full advantage of all Portland's population.

Mr. BROOKS. But the city of Portland has only four representatives, while under an equal system of representation it would be entitled to eight or ten.

Mr. BLAINE. It is adopted on the basis of counties, and the gentleman's objection is not well founded.

Mr. BROOKS. It is not republican to disfranchise the cities of Portland and Bangor, with other cities in that State, and the cities of New Haven and Hartford, and other cities in the State of Connecticut.

I come next in order to the State of Pennsylvania. There is a State with a Republican majority of about seventeen thousand, where the Democratic vote is about two hundred and ninety-one thousand. I ask has this State, under a system of gerrymandering—a word created in Massachusetts—that Governor Geary might exercise this anti-republican power of destroying equality of representation; I ask whether the State of Pennsylvania with six Democratic Representatives in this House and eighteen Republican Representatives, with only a majority of less than seventeen thousand over, we hear, three hundred thousand Democratic votes, by a wrongful and unjust apportionment made for party purposes to create an immense Republican majority of this House; I ask whether that is any fairer system of representation than the one which exists on the Eastern Shore of Maryland? Under the contrast which the gentleman from Maryland has drawn with his own section of the country, there is no equality whatever in the State of Pennsylvania more than in the State of Maryland.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will allow me to say that inequality is not produced by a representation of larger or smaller numbers in a particular district, but because of the aggregation in particular districts of men of particular political character. You could not divide Berks or Lancaster, and yet their great majorities give them what I have already stated. It is not on account of the population; there is no inequality there.

Mr. BROOKS. I comprehend that by a series of ingenious operations, by dovetailing Democratic counties with those having large Republican majorities, what is well described in the well-known process of gerrymandering, the Republican majority of Pennsylvania have so contrived their legislation as to make the representation upon this floor in the ratio of six Democrats to eighteen Republicans, when their whole majority in the State is less than seventeen thousand. That is called republican representation!

I suppose I shall be informed—and I dare say I will get into a hornet's nest—Tennessee and Missouri have republican governments!

But before I come to that, Mr. Speaker, I ask whether the State of Wisconsin has a republican representation upon this floor? Wisconsin has between eight and nine hundred thousand population, and yet her representation has been so managed by her Republican majority that while there are upon this floor five Republicans from that State, the Democracy, with only about fifteen thousand majority against them, is represented by one solitary star. Is that republican representation? Would it be just and right to interfere with Maryland and not also go into the State of Wisconsin to correct the misrepresentation there?

Mr. COVODE. I wish to say to my friend from New York that an effort was made to make another Democratic district in western Pennsylvania, and that happened to be my own district, but notwithstanding all the combined forces they were not able to succeed.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman is a lucky man. He knows how to work minorities into majorities. But let that pass.

Now, for the States of Tennessee and Missouri. With the white population in those two States crushed out, having no representation in a large degree upon this floor, the white population of those States represented by a minority here, with only one Democrat from Missouri, I ask gentlemen to tell me whether those are republican forms of government? I know you tell me those who are disfranchised are rebels and have no right to representation upon the floor of this House. But is that a republican form of government? Has not man his rights whatsoever that man may be? If that man has been a rebel, trampled and beaten, is he less a man in form and feature of the God who created him? Is there any right but the right of arbitrary authority to trample upon these men?

And you who tell us that the negro is a man and a brother; why, when the rebel repents of his errors and swears allegiance to the Government; why, when he is forced to take oaths which cannot admit him upon the floor of this House, is he reduced to the level of the serf of Europe or the slave of Egypt? Why disfranchise, why not allow him representation in this boasted House of Representatives where a republican form exists, at least through republican or loyal men? Why not allow him to speak for himself in this convention of loyal men? Sir, no more republicanism exists in the State of Tennessee—is Tennessee not represented here while we are legislating and making laws for her by the extraordinary action of this Congress—no more republican form of Government exists in the State of Tennessee nor in Missouri than there is under the rule of the Pacha of Egypt or the Sultan of Turkey.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask the gentleman whether he would unite with us on this side of the House in giving to the black man of the North representation on the floor of this House.

Mr. BROOKS. Sir, I would leave that question where the Constitution leaves it. I would leave it with the people of the States. If the people of the State of New York choose to give to the black man the right of representation I shall cheerfully acquiesce in the will of the majority. But in my own State, where both Houses of the Legislature are Republican by large majorities, and the Governor is also a Republican, although their Representatives on the floor of this House vote free suffrage to the black man, they deny it in the State. And so in the State of Ohio and others.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish to be diverted by the criticism of gentlemen. The gentleman from Minnesota has greater facilities for getting the floor than I have. It is only by grace and favor that I have an opportunity now and then to speak.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman declines to yield altogether.

Mr. BROOKS. Not altogether. I am not sufficiently skilled in debate to be subject to criticism from all sides of the House; but whenever I interfere with a particular gentleman's domain I feel it my duty to yield to him. I have not yet come to the State of Minnesota. If I do so at all in the course of my argument the honorable gentleman shall have an opportunity to question me at will.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman has alluded to my State; will he yield to me a moment?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will state that in Missouri we are preparing to have a republican form of government, and when we get it I reckon there will not be any Democrats sent to Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. Well, sir, I will answer the gentleman by referring to the State of Massachusetts, and I wish the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts to listen to me. I suppose that old Commonwealth will be surprised when I proclaim here on the floor of this House that no republican government exists in that State. A large majority of the people of Massachusetts, the most enlightened and intelligent portion, the cultivated women of the old Commonwealth, the equals in intelligence and capacity of the men who vote for the members of this House—and I shall not offend the members from Massachusetts by saying quite their equals also in intelligence and capacity—are disfranchised in that old State of Massachusetts; and these women constitute much the larger majority of the people. Now, if you are about to come to a republican form of government, and your idea of such a government is one in which the black people are enfranchised, I tell the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON] I am for my own wife, daughter, and sister, my own kith and kin, my own flesh and blood of Caucasian origin. I am in favor of free suffrage for them before I ever would consent to grant it to another race and color. And though it is not for me to interfere in any way with the politics of Missouri, I do not see how a Missourian can go before his wife, his daughter, his sister, his mother, all disfranchised, and say to them that the ignorant negro of the State of Missouri has a better right to vote under a republican form of government than are the wives and daughters of the white citizens of the State.

Mr. ANDERSON. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] does not understand me as being opposed to woman suffrage. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. The cause of woman is gaining ground in Missouri, and my friend near me from that State [Mr. NOELL] has an adjunct now in the honorable gentleman yonder, [Mr. ANDERSON.]

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. BALDWIN. I only wish to say this: it is true that women do not vote in the State of Massachusetts, but the question is being agitated there. Now, I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] if he will appear and speak in behalf of the women of thus being allowed to vote?

Mr. BROOKS. If the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] will follow the example of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] and say that his own State has not a republican form of government, I will be willing to speak for the women while he is speaking for the freedmen.

Mr. BALDWIN. I will not say that. But will the gentleman come down to my State and advocate earnestly the extension of suffrage to women?

Mr. BROOKS. If it shall be held that a republican form of government consists in universal suffrage to its full extent, then I shall be for women and even for children voting. That is the answer I make to the gentleman.

Sir, tell me not of a republican form of government with the representation that now exists upon the floor of the other branch of Congress. Is it a republican form of government under which the small State of Rhode Island has the same number of Representatives in the other branch of Congress with the great State of New York and its millions of population? And so, too, in regard to Delaware. Has that little State, under a thoroughly republican form of government, the right to fully offset in one branch of Congress the great Keystone State or the State of Ohio? Is the Senate of the United States republican in any form whatsoever, in name, pretense, or even shadow of form, if numbers constitute republicanism, if population is the test? No, sir, as the Senate of the United States now exists there is no such republicanism in it. It is a body without numbers, a body without population, a body existing in utter defiance of any form of Democratic government whatsoever; and I shall expect the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] when he undertakes the reformation of affairs in his own State to introduce upon the floor of this House a proposition to abolish the Senate of the United States in its present form, and ask for a change of the Constitution of the United States in such form that we may have equality of representation there as well as in this body.

Sir, the little State of Nebraska has been shoved into the Union with two Senators in Congress to offset such great States as Ohio, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and New York. Why, sir, there are more people in the lower wards of the city of New York, plying their avocations and pursuing their various forms of industry, even underground, ay, sir, even underground, five to one, than now exist in the whole State of Nebraska. Yet Nebraska has in the Senate of the United States an equality of representation with the great State of New York.

Now, sir, whenever we in this Congress undertake to create a practically republican form of government, as defined by the gentleman from Maryland, I propose that we shall go to the very bottom, the foundation of things. I do not propose to halt in Maryland, but to look over the whole extent of our country, here, there, and everywhere, and endeavor to republicanize the whole country. When that is undertaken and carried out, the Constitution of the United States will no longer exist. And there will be no more liberty on this side of the Potomac, no more respect paid to the Constitution, than is now paid under the military monarchy, on the other side of that Potomac.

Sir, no more dangerous doctrine can possibly be put forth than that put forth by the venerable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] that Congress has the power and it is its duty to adjudicate upon and determine what constitutes representation in a State. Sir, it is an utter subversion and overthrow of the whole structure and form of our Government; a centralization, a consolidation, a despotism of the worst sort, utterly repugnant to the ideas of the fathers who framed the Constitution of the United States.

The House, I trust, will excuse me for the diffuseness of these remarks, which have been made without any preparation, because the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland seemed to call for some reply. But perhaps at this hour, and in view of the peculiar circumstances under which we are now assembled, our time is best consumed in declamation and debate of this sort, for we might be engaged in much more dangerous occupation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of John Perry.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes;" and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river.

The message further announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment, disagreed to by the House, to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes; had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. BUCKALEW as conferees on the part of the Senate.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS IN MARYLAND—AGAIN.

Mr. PAINE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. PAINE. I will yield for that purpose, but for no other.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask my venerable friend from Maryland, who has again and again insisted that Congress shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government, where he finds that doctrine?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to engage in these colloquies on the floor. I seek to enunciate my opinions with distinctness—

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the question with all proper respect for the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say in reply to the gentleman that the Constitution of the United States expressly declares that Congress shall guaranty to the several States of the Union a republican form of government.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no such provision in the copy of the Constitution which I possess. I rose for the purpose of making this correction: that while Congress has a sufficiency of power and knows how to exercise it, the Constitution does not contain any provision that Congress shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government. The provision is that—

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Congress is not "the United States."

Mr. GARFIELD. Who is?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that General Grant is a part of "the United States;" Admiral Farragut is a part of "the United States;" the Army and Navy are a part of "the United States;" the President and the Supreme Court are a part of "the United States;" the people, above all, are part of "the United States." Congress never had this power. The makers of the Constitution never gave Congress the power.

Mr. THOMAS. I will briefly respond to the inquiry of the gentleman (which concerns a subject very broad and latitudinous) by advising him to examine the seventh volume of Howard's Reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the celebrated case there reported of Luther vs. Borden, which I remember to have read many years ago, he will, if I am not very much mistaken, find the doctrine laid down that this grant of power to the Government of the United States clothes Congress with the power to look inside of a State and determine whether a government claiming to be republican is so or not, because, said the Supreme Court, it is for Congress to exercise the power given to the United States to guaranty a republican form of government to every State in the Union. This was the decision solemnly rendered in the case of Luther vs. Borden, growing out of the political troubles in Rhode Island many years ago.

Mr. PAINE. Before renewing the call for the previous question I shall take the liberty to make a statement respecting my own State, which has been referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.]

It was stated to the House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] as the result of gerrymandering in the State of Wisconsin that State was represented upon this floor by five Republicans and only one Democrat. It is a sufficient answer to that to say to this House that the Democratic Representative had a majority of only 2,600 in round numbers, while my own majority, the least of all of the Republican members, was 4,880; one of my colleagues having a majority approximating 8,000. The average majority was far greater than that of the Democratic Representative.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not think I applied the word gerrymandering to the State of Wisconsin. I applied it to Pennsylvania, and not to Wisconsin.

Mr. PAINE. I believe the gentleman used the word in connection with the State of Wisconsin; but I will not quarrel about it.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire of the gentlemen from New York, [Mr. Brooks and Mr. Robinson,] who deny the right of Congress to respond effectively to the Maryland memorial, whether they have investigated the question as to the constitutional right of Congress to regulate suffrage in all the States so far as electors for the most numerous branch of the Legislature are concerned? Sir, I assert, and I do it, as the members of the last Congress will I think admit, on abundant historical evidence, that the framers of the Constitution confided that power to Congress when, by section four of article one, they provided that Congress should regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections; and that they submitted conditionally, and only meant to submit conditionally, to the States the question of who should vote for the most numerous branch of the Legislature, together with the regulation of the time and place of holding elections. That question was to be submitted to the States in the first place; so that, if it were rightly disposed of by them, Congress need not exercise the power reserved to it. As I only wish for the present to invite the attention of those gentlemen to the question, I will hold myself ready to furnish them or others with conclusive evidence drawn from the debates in the Convention which framed the Constitution and the conventions which adopted it for the several States, and will not inflict a repetition of it again upon gentlemen who were members of the last Congress, or further pursue the subject at this time.

Having been absent from the House during most of the discussion, I content myself with thus inviting the attention of gentlemen to the question and asserting my conviction, and my readiness to demonstrate the fact, that Congress has the right to regulate suffrage so far as relates to electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature, whereby it may determine who shall vote for members of Congress, and who shall select the members of at least one of the two bodies which elect United States Senators. In this opinion I stand with Madison and the fathers of the Constitution generally, and do but utter their views, their most earnest convictions, when I say that without that power being in Congress, an enduring, united Government is an impossibility; that without it one State may destroy the Union and overthrow the Government. I have said thus much because I did not want this argument to pass without the utterance of at least a feeble protest against any other conclusion than that which I have enunciated, and which their own words prove was the conviction of the framers of the Constitution and the founders of our Government.

Mr. PAINE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The paper was then ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PAINE. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to offer a resolution relating to the adjournment and closing of the present session of Congress. After I have had it read at the Clerk's desk I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to offer an amendment, and then to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to offer an amendment to the amendment. I will not yield for discussion, but will call for the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Friday, the 29th instant, at twelve o'clock m.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment as a substitute:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That on Friday, the 29th day of March, instant, at the hour of three o'clock p. m., the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn their respective Houses until Wednesday the 5th day of June next, meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, those officers shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until Wednesday, the 4th day of September next, meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, they shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until the first Monday of December next.

Mr. DONNELLY. I offer the following as an amendment to the original resolution, to come in at the end:

Until the first Wednesday in July next, and, unless otherwise ordered, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, shall on said day adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday in December, in the present year.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I will yield to hear it read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] by striking out the word "Friday" and inserting "Monday next."

Mr. PAINE. I cannot consent to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe I have a right to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. PAINE. I call the previous question.

On seconding the previous question there were—yeas 62, noes 25.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the Senate is now considering the resolution passed yesterday, and for the purpose of waiting for it I move to lay this resolution and amendments on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to say—

Mr. SPALDING. I object to debate.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 63, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Churchill, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Driggs, Eckley, Els, Farnsworth, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Polsey, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Calkins, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Denison, Donnelly, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Holman, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketchum, Kitchin, Koontz, Mallory, Marvin, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Paine, Peters, Plants, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Auken, Van Trump, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Boyer, Bromwell, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Dawes, Dodge, Eggleston, Eliot, Fox, Haight, Harding, Hunter, Julian, Kelsey, Lafin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, McCarthy, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Noell, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Baum, Schenck, Selye, Shollabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stone, Taffe, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—47.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to call the attention of the House to a slight modification of the original resolution which will be rendered necessary in case the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] shall be adopted. As it now stands it reads "for the close of the present session." I wish to substitute the word "adjourn" if the amendment shall be adopted, so as to make it consistent.

And I wish here to give the reason why I have declined to allow any discussion on this resolution. I supposed that the matter had been fully discussed heretofore upon the resolutions that have been before the House, and that the minds of members were made up on the subject. I will state further that I am not so strongly inclined to either one of these propositions but I shall be content whichever one is adopted. But I want something voted upon by the House at this time.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to ask a question of the Chair. If the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] should be adopted, will it not prevent the members of this House from visiting the Paris Exposition this year?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman very well understands that that is not a parliamentary question.

Mr. BROOMALL. All of these amendments propose in certain contingencies an adjournment until the first Monday in December next, upon which day the next regular session will begin. Now, if either amendment is adopted, and the resolution, as amended, should be adopted, will it not require us to at least go through the form of meeting on the first Monday of December next to close formally the present session before commencing the next session?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question at the time, should he then be occupying the Chair.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire to ask the Chair a question in regard to the effect of a vote. If the amendment shall be adopted, and there should be a quorum in one House and not in the other, when the time for meeting shall arrive, will not an adjournment be required?

The SPEAKER. No order can be made, except by a quorum of each House, by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. DONNELLY. If the amendment I have offered should prevail, and the resolution so modified should be adopted, and Congress should meet here in July next, would there be anything to prevent another meeting in September, should it then be deemed necessary?

The SPEAKER. A quorum of the two Houses in July next can determine that question for themselves.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. DONNELLY.

Mr. SCHENCK. Members about me here ask me to vote for this amendment, and then we can afterward vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] Now, I understand this to be a substitute—

Mr. BINGHAM. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] desires to propound a question to the Chair.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague, I hope, will restrain his excitability. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] is a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, it is not; I ask the Chair if that is the state of the question.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is in the nature of a substitute for the original resolution. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] is to add to the original resolution; and therefore the question will be taken upon it before it is taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. DONNELLY, which was to add to the resolution of Mr. PAINE, the following:

Until the first Wednesday in July next, and unless otherwise ordered, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House shall on said day adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday in December in the present year.

Mr. SCHENCK. On that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was then agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. ALLISON, to strike out all after the concurring clause and insert the following:

That on Friday, the 29th day of March, instant, at the hour of three o'clock p. m., the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn their respective Houses until Wednesday, the 5th day of June next, at twelve o'clock meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, those officers shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until Wednesday, the 4th day of September next, at twelve o'clock meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, they shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 55, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, William Lawrence, Lean, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, McClurg, Mercur, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Perham, Plants, Polsley, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Denison, Dodge, Donnelly, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Getz, Grossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Miller, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Spaulding, Stewart, Taber, Twitwell, Van Anken, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Barnes, Beaman, Boyer, Bromwell, Cobb, Dawes, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Fox, Haight, Harding, Julian, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, McCarthy, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Orth, Paine, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taft, Taylor, Thomas, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. ROSS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of John Perry.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If there be no objection I should like to have this resolution passed at this time. If there be objection, let it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BINGHAM. It ought to be referred. The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TRANSPORTATION OF PROVISIONS SOUTH.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, on the 22d of February last this House passed a joint resolution, which was subsequently passed by the Senate and became a law, authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Navy to furnish transportation for the purpose of carrying to the ports of Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile such contributions in the form of provisions, &c., as the people might offer for the relief of the destitute in the South. In a communication which I have received from the Secretary of the Navy that officer states that his power under the resolution has been exhausted, so that he finds himself without authority to furnish transportation for a large amount of supplies now in the city of Baltimore ready to be transported, having been contributed by the people of Pennsylvania and the people of Baltimore. I therefore ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution, which is in substance and almost in its precise words similar to the resolution passed by the House on the 22d of last February. It is entitled a joint resolution to furnish transportation of provisions to the destitute in the South.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy, upon the application of the contributors, or of any person on their behalf, to charter a vessel to convey provisions contributed by the people from Baltimore, Maryland, to Wilmington, North Carolina, for gratuitous distribution among the destitute of the South, under the direction of the contributors and such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I did not hear the reading of the whole of this resolution, and I wish to inquire of my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] whether it contemplates furnishing transportation at the expense of the Government?

Mr. BINGHAM. It does; and so did the joint resolution of February 22.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. By the resolution already passed transportation was restricted to three ports therein named. This resolution proposes an extension of the provision, so as to authorize transportation to the port of Wilmington, North Carolina. I hope my colleague will not object.

I desire to state that it appears by the communication which has been sent to me that some of the persons contributing have tendered a thousand bushels of corn, which are now awaiting transportation. The parties themselves cannot be expected to pay the expense of transportation; and this transportation costs the Government little or nothing.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that the law already passed gives the Secretary of the Navy all necessary power; that it is only necessary for him to carry out the law.

Mr. BINGHAM. By the law now on the statute-book transportation is limited to the three ports of Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile. This resolution proposes to authorize transportation to Wilmington, North Carolina.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that declaration. I desire to state, as an additional reason for the passage of this resolution, that the Secretary of the Navy, in the letter which lies upon my desk, states that he has exhausted the power under the existing law.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will this resolution authorize additional transportation at the expense of the Government of the United States?

Mr. BINGHAM. It will authorize additional transportation from the port of Baltimore to the port of Wilmington, North Carolina. I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I insist on the objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move then to suspend the rules, to permit the introduction of the resolution.

On the motion there were—87 in the affirmative, 1 in the negative.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The joint resolution was accordingly introduced, and read a first and second time. It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUSE MESSENGERS.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be authorized and directed to retain the number of messengers now employed during the recess of Congress.

Mr. ROSS. I object to that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask my colleague not to object to it.

Mr. ROSS. Why do you want them here during the recess when there is nothing for them to do?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 16; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER under the rule ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WOODBRIDGE and Mr. ROSS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 26.

So (two thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was accordingly received.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. KITCHEN, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. NICHOLSON.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. TABER asked and obtained leave for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of John Graham, for compensation for carrying the United States mail.

HOUSE MESSENGERS—AGAIN.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Indiana to hear what his resolution is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman to let me offer the following substitute for his resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be authorized to retain in the service of the House during the vacation of Congress such of the messengers and other employees as the public service may require, the persons so retained to include such soldiers or seamen disabled in the service of the United States as are now employed by him; and it is declared to be the sense of this House that the officers of the House should in making appointments give the preference to soldiers and seamen disabled in the service of the United States, when competent for the duties thereof.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. While I have no objection to that, still as it encumbers the proposition I have submitted I very much prefer that the gentlemen would offer it as a separate measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be submitted to a vote of the House. It retains in the service of the Doorkeeper the soldiers and sailors who are now employed, who will be dismissed unless this proposition is adopted.

Mr. LOGAN. How do you know they will be dismissed?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems to me the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana should be agreed to. I would be willing to make it a joint resolution, so as to apply to the other House as well as to this. We have seen there the bravest soldiers rejected by the Senate.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The Doorkeeper being a soldier, and a very gallant soldier, and of course having sympathy for all those who may be under him, will do ample justice to any person having that peculiar claim upon his favor.

Now, sir, I have introduced the resolution at the suggestion of the Doorkeeper himself, who considers it to be a matter of necessity. It is a plain, simple proposition, applying to the Doorkeepers who have been brought here from the several States, each State having its fair share. If the resolution be not agreed to, going home and again returning here, they will not receive enough to pay their expenses.

And let me say, in addition, that the Senate always retains its Doorkeepers during the recess, making them salaried officers. Now, we have passed resolutions that Congress shall come back here in June and at other times, and these men will have to be here. It must be evident to gentlemen that under the circumstances a resolution of this kind is absolutely necessary, and I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the previous question be voted down, my substitute will then be in order.

The SPEAKER. Any amendment will then be in order.

Mr. WARD. Is this a usual resolution, and has it passed the House heretofore? Has it not been the rule for the Doorkeeper to retain such as he thought necessary, and to discharge the others? Is not that the old rule in this matter?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I am not familiar enough with the former rules to give an answer affirmatively or negatively. In my recollection Congress has never before been in the condition in which we now are. We have been in a session for only a few days, and these persons have come from various parts of the country at great expense. Any precedent established in this matter would not apply to the present emergency. I know heretofore there have been some of the doorkeepers retained during the entire Congress. Under the circumstances of the present Congress it is deemed necessary, and it is necessary in my estimation, that this force should be retained.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman yields to me for a moment. I wish to state an instance to the House right in point. The Doorkeeper, Mr. Lippincott, conceded to me the appointment of one assistant Doorkeeper. After getting together our delegates we agreed upon a man, a soldier in our State, and telegraphed him. He left his business and came here. If this resolution does not pass, and the rule prevailing heretofore shall prevail now, that gentleman will be discharged and will not have money enough to pay his passage back.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. If the previous question is voted down, will it then be in order for the gentleman from Indiana to introduce his substitute?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order for any gentleman to offer any amendment that is germane.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 51, noes 35.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 24, noes 57.

The resolution was then agreed to—ayes 68, noes 17.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for raising the rates of duties on imports; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of two hundred and five working men of Northampton county, Pennsylvania, asking for the passage of a protective tariff, and to have it read.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

The SPEAKER. The memorial will be presented under the rule, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. R. No. 79) to confirm certain sales made by the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina to persons in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 53) relating to the transportation of troops by the Isthmus routes to the Pacific States and Territories.

IRON-CLAD CAMANCHE.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution relative to the iron-clad Camanche, and to make an explanation in reference to it.

No objection being made, the resolution was read for information. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to return to the contractors, Donahue, Ryan & Secor, the iron-clad Camanche, delivered at the navy-yard at Mare Island, California, on returning the amount paid said contractors by the Government for the construction of said ship, together with cost of guns, ammunition, and stores on board at the time of delivery, and that Donahue, Ryan & Secor have full authority to dispose of the same.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire this resolution to be put on its passage and I will give the reasons why it should be passed. A resolution for the payment of damages to these contractors amounting to $179,000 has passed the Senate three times after three several reports from Senate committees. A bill or resolution of the same character, introduced into the Thirty-Eighth Congress was referred to the Naval Committee and was favorably reported by them to the House, but it failed to pass for want of time. A few days ago one of these resolutions passed the Senate by a unanimous vote. Every committee that has investigated this claim has decided that it is just and honest and that the parties ought to be paid. There never has been any objection made to the payment of this claim by any committee, I believe, that has ever investigated it. On account of an "omnibus bill," as it was called, which was introduced in this House, which was distasteful to some members, perhaps this measure may have acquired a like character. But the fact is, this was an entirely separate measure. The committee reported upon it separately, and asked that it should be passed upon its merits as a just and honest claim. Some days ago I asked to have the Senate resolution taken up and passed by the House. Objection was made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD,] who, I believe, was one of the members of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I then asked permission to explain to the House the reason why the resolution ought to pass. I was not permitted to do that. The resolution was then referred to the Committee of Claims, a committee not yet in existence.

I will now say to members of this House that Mr. Ryan, one of the applicants for damages in this case, has been here for more than two years with his family from California; a part of his children being left in California and a part of them being here. He has been promised from the time he came here a favorable report by every committee to whom his claim was referred. They have all reported favorably upon it, and it has passed the Senate each time, and would have passed the House but for the objection which has sent it to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LOGAN. I do not yield.

Mr. WARD. The gentleman has referred to me.

Mr. LOGAN. I have only referred to the action of the House at the time the gentleman objected; I have not referred to any remark or objection to the bill which the gentleman made.

On yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] asked that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of this joint resolution, so that it might be considered by the House; but his request was not granted. Now, I have here the reports made by the committees of the Senate and by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House, and they all show that these claimants are entitled to over one hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars as damages.

I will state briefly how these damages arose. These claimants entered into a contract to build the iron-clad Camanche, which iron-clad was to be built in the city of New York. They engaged a rolling-mill for the purpose of rolling out the side plating of the vessel. While that was being done the Secretary of the Navy ordered that the plates that had been made should be delivered by the contractors to other parties who were engaged in building other vessels for the Government. By that action on the part of the Government they were delayed in getting out the plates for the Camanche. Then when they had prepared the engines and machinery for the vessel the Government took them and put them into another vessel. Finally, under direction of the Government, these parties took the vessel apart, and put the pieces on the vessel Aquilla, and sent it around to California during the stormy season of the year. That vessel was sunk in a storm, with the parts of the Camanche on board. And these parties were compelled to expend a large sum of money to raise that vessel, obtaining the pieces of the Camanche and putting them together again, and making the vessel what it is now, as good a vessel of its kind perhaps as floats upon the broad sea.

Now, during the time these delays were caused by the Government the materials that were necessary for the construction of this vessel were rising in price and costing the contractors more and more every day. The completion of the contract was delayed by the action of the Government. At the time the vessel containing the parts of the Camanche was sunk, and these parties had to make these heavy expenditures to pay the wreckers and persons who assisted in raising from the deep those parts again, they had to pay in gold, which was then worth 170 in the city of New York. All of these expenses, all of these losses fell upon the contractors, not because of any fault on their part, but because of the acts of those representing the Government of the United States. These men did all that they could do. They have been—at least one of them has been—broken up in fortune by this contract. Law-suits have been instituted against them; judgments have been obtained against them. Yet, although it has been decided three several times that these parties are entitled to this amount, the Government has thus far failed to do them justice. All that they ask is simple justice.

It is strange, sir, that in this House claims can sometimes go through in cases where the parties have done nothing advantageous to the Government; while these men who assisted the Government in forming its Navy during the late war, who built one of the best vessels that floats upon the seas, who have been broken pecuniarily by reason of their fidelity to the interests of the Government, are almost the only men who have been denied the measure of justice to which they are entitled, and which would be awarded to them in any court on earth, if they could bring their case before a judicial tribunal.

Sir, before this case came before this Congress, two vessels were authorized to be returned under similar circumstances. The Thirty-Ninth Congress enacted a law—the bill being passed through this House, as I understand, without having been reported from the Committee of Claims—allowing to a gentleman named Forbes pay for a vessel which he had built which did not comply with the terms and stipulations of the contract. In the cases of Mr. Quintard and others, who were refused relief in money, bills were passed authorizing the return of their vessels that they might sell them, making more out of them perhaps than the price which the Government would have paid.

Mr. BURR. I desire to ask the gentleman whether these contractors will be satisfied with the return of the vessel?

Mr. LOGAN. They must be satisfied with anything they can get. They have asked remuneration in money, and it has been refused to them. The committee of this House has refused to report the bill to remunerate these contractors for their losses. They have now no other resource than to ask Congress to authorize the return of the vessel to them, they refunding to the Government the amount of money which they have received, so that they may take their chances for the sale of the vessel in some other country, and in this way perhaps remunerate themselves for their losses in the completion of the vessel. I only ask this as the last resort, believing that this man Ryan and the others interested in this case have a just claim upon the consideration of Congress, and one that should not be denied.

I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to offer an amendment, if it be in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I will allow the amendment to be offered, if it will not interfere with putting the resolution on its passage.

Mr. WARD. I desire to inquire whether the resolution is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WARD. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has been so discourteous as to refuse to permit me to ask a question, I will object to the introduction of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. After the gentleman from Illinois has concluded the explanation which he is making by unanimous consent, the Chair will put the question whether there is objection to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. WARD. I simply desired to ask a question: and the gentleman declined to hear me, though he had referred to me in his remarks. He has yielded to the gentleman from Ohio to whom he has not referred in debate. I simply asked the privilege of propounding a question. I have no disposition to object to any gentleman's proposition. If ordinary courtesy is extended to me, I never object to any privilege gentlemen may ask.

Mr. LOGAN. If I have been at fault in not extending ordinary courtesy to the gentleman, I am sorry for it. I know that I have never been guilty of intentional discourtesy toward any gentleman. When, during my remarks, the gentleman from New York rose, I supposed that he wanted to answer me in reference to the action of the committee, supposing that I was addressing myself to him. But I was not alluding to that point; I was only speaking of a fact in regard to the action of the House, and was not referring to him particularly, but only as one of the members of the committee. I said nothing the gentleman could object to.

Mr. WARD. I simply wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LOGAN. Then ask your question now.

Mr. WARD. Very well. The question I desire to ask is, whether this claim of Ryan was not embraced in that omnibus bill?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the question, and I think to the gentleman's satisfaction. This claim of Ryan, Secor & Co., was embraced originally in the omnibus bill, but in the Senate the report of the Naval Committee, as gentlemen will find if they take pains to examine it, put it on a different basis from all the other claims. Hence, in the Senate this was taken out of the omnibus bill, and passed as a separate measure. It came to this House three several times separate from the omnibus bill. It has no connection with the omnibus bill whatever.

Mr. WARD. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Did not this House pass an act for examination of all these claims by the Secretary of the Navy, and for a report of his conclusions to be made to the Fortieth Congress?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; this House did pass a law to examine into all these claims, but without any law of that kind they were examined into by the Navy Department once before. Now, in reference to claims of a doubtful character it was well enough to do that. It was well enough that such claims should be investigated thoroughly. But, sir, it seems to me it would be a strange proceeding to compel these men to go back to a naval board, to go back to a committee, to do what? To do what four different committees have already done, and that is to report this bill. Every committee has reported in favor of this claim, and I do not see why it should not now be passed.

I will state further in reference to the history of this matter, that it was put on the Private Calendar and afterward taken up and referred to the Committee of Claims. It was there referred to a sub-committee. I will not say what the opinions of these men were in reference to it; I will not give their opinions because they are not now in the House. They were Mr. Delano, Mr. Thornton, and Mr. Sloan. I have not corresponded with any of them, but I know that Mr. Thornton, who thoroughly investigated this claim, yesterday voluntarily telegraphed to Mr. Ryan that he was in favor of it, and that he would have voted for it if it had been before the House by itself. He was one of the committee and of course knew all the facts.

Under all these circumstances, believing the claim to be honest and just, I ask that this resolution be placed before the House and at once be put on its passage.

Mr. WARD. I withdraw my objection. I hope the House will give me an opportunity to be heard on the resolution in some form.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPALDING. I renew the objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to suspend the rules. I only ask that we shall do for these men what this House has done for others who have had much more money.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 8.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not ask for a further count.

So (two thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has asked several times that members should vote on one side or the other. The House is aware of the fact that it is thinning in numbers, and that it is necessary every member should vote if it be not desired to delay action by having tellers.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman yields to me, and I propose to offer an amendment which shall bring before the House the original joint resolution in order to have action on that. It is certainly germane to the subject of the resolution. I want to bring up the same question which arose yesterday on my motion to discharge the Committee of Claims from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 19, for the relief of these parties in order to substitute that resolution for the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois. Is that in order?

Mr. WARD. It seems to me that it is not in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am asking the Chair whether it is in order. I propose to bring Senate joint resolution No. 19, relating to these same parties, before the House, and to move it as a substitute for the pending resolution.

Mr. WARD. This whole subject has been referred to the Committee of Claims, and cannot be brought back except by a special resolution to that effect.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is the resolution I offer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this joint resolution cannot be inserted as an amendment, but the gentleman can introduce an amendment varying in some particular from the resolution ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims. It does not need to be a substantial variance; a verbal variance will be sufficient, as will be found by referring to the rule.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is in that way I propose to offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proposed to amend by discharging the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to offer the joint resolution itself.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be offered in the same words as the resolution referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SCHENCK. My original proposition was to substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois a resolution to discharge the Committee of Claims from the further consideration of the Senate resolution relating to this claim, so as to bring that resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that that is not in order, and refers to the rule, to be found on page 12 of the Digest, as follows:

"No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment; and no bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

The note by the compiler is as follows:

"The latter clause of this rule, as originally reported to the House, contained at the end of it: 'nor by any proposition containing the substance in whole or in part of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.' These words were stricken out by the House before it would agree to the rule, by which it would seem to have been decided that an amendment containing the substance of another bill or resolution may be entertained."

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe the Senate resolution is on the Clerk's desk, and I ask what is the exact sum that is named in it; if it is not $179,000 80?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the contractors do not care about the eighty cents, and therefore I will offer as an amendment the same resolution changing the sum named to $179,000.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. WARD. I believe that is not in order without a suspension of the rules. It is a distinct proposition.

The SPEAKER. The rules have been suspended to allow the joint resolution in regard to the iron-clad Camanche to be considered in the House; therefore an amendment which is germane is in order.

Mr. SPALDING. Does not the amendment make an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late; the rules have been suspended.

Mr. SPALDING. The House by a two-third vote allowed this resolution to be considered, but not an amendment making an appropriation. I believe we have a right to have another vote taken about suspending the rule requiring a bill or resolution making an appropriation to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The rules have been suspended to introduce this resolution, and it has been explained at some length. The amendment is germane and is in order. The suspension of the rules covers that point.

Mr. SPALDING. It enables them to get money from the Government under false pretenses.

The SPEAKER. It does not, because a majority of the House is required to pass the amendment. The only reason why bills containing appropriations are required first to be considered in Committee of the Whole is that members shall not be surprised by the introduction of bills for the relief of claimants by appropriating money directly; hence the rule requiring that they shall be submitted to the Committee of the Whole. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has explained this resolution at some length. The amendment is germane to the original resolution, the House is aware of the nature of the proposition for the relief of certain contractors, and it will require a vote of a majority of the House to pass it.

Mr. WARD. Is the amendment before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WARD. I inquire if it does not contain an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just decided that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSS. I call attention to the fact that the original resolution is to return the iron-clad vessel to the contractors, and this amendment appropriates $179,000. It appears to me that it is not germane to the original proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that the amendment is germane. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] thinks the Chair is incorrect he can appeal from the decision of the Chair, and the House will then decide whether the decision of the Chair should be sustained or not.

Mr. ROSS. I do not propose to appeal from the decision of the Chair; I desired only to call the attention of the Chair to that point.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose, after the very full and very fair explanation made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN], to detain the House by many remarks of my own. My colleague [Mr. SPALDING] intimates that by taking advantage of the suspension of the rules to offer the amendment which I have submitted—which, though differing in form from, is substantially the same as the joint resolution which has been ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims—he intimated that I was endeavoring to obtain money by false pretenses; and he even intimated in a good-humored way that I might be indicted for it. I will say that I think I could defend myself against a charge of that sort before a fair jury much easier than I could defend myself against the charge of sitting in my place here as a member of Congress and undertaking to obtain by false pretenses from these men their labor for years without paying them for it as they should be paid.

Now, I am opposed to the resolution of my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] as originally offered, for the reason that these contractors, driven to desperation, are offering to do what a liberal Government ought not to accept from them. They have been here for two years endeavoring to obtain the allowance of a claim admitted by all who have examined it to be a just and righteous claim; and because they have not yet obtained it, as a last resort they express their willingness to take back the property which they have furnished to the Government, to return the money which they have received from the Government, go their ways, and pocket the loss of their time and labor, submitting to it with such grace as they may. Now, we ought not to ask of them anything of the kind. And it was because I thought no such offer ought to be accepted by the Government that I sought yesterday to have the Committee of Claims discharged from the consideration of the joint resolution of the Senate, and have it brought before the House, in order that it might be passed, as in justice it should be.

Now, what is the history of this matter? I can add but little to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] As your record will show, three several times have the Senate passed a bill to pay these men. The claim has been carefully considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House during the last Congress, and favorably reported upon by them. It was one of the provisions of what has been called the omnibus bill, providing for the payment of contractors for a number of the iron-clads. The members who constituted that committee, with perhaps a single exception, say that if this claim had been presented by itself, it was so manifestly just, they would have reported in its favor, and it only failed of favorable action because its fortune was embarked in connection with that of other and perhaps less justifiable claims.

This is the history of legislation in regard to this matter.

I made the motion I did on yesterday, not merely from having had some opportunity of knowing how this claim separated itself from the others and stood upon fair, just, and honest grounds, as has been explained to the House this morning by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] but because I was also particularly requested to do so by some two or three Senators from the Pacific, whose letter I now hold, entreating me to do this. The request is based upon the fact that California at this time has no Representative in this body. If California were represented here, as she was in the last Congress long before this time, even during this present short session I am authorized to believe they would have brought this matter in some way if they could to the attention of this House. In their absence, and because there is no one here representing that State, and these contractors are the immediate constituents of one who was a Representative here in the last Congress, I interposed in their behalf.

I shall most heartily support the application of the gentleman from Illinois to have this matter considered at this time. But I propose that instead of considering it in the manner that he proposes, upon the proposition to give back to these men this property, my amendment shall be adopted, by which they will be paid honestly for what they have done and have furnished to the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] for ten minutes.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, it is disagreeable to me to make any objection to this claim or any other claim which gentlemen feel called upon to press upon the consideration of the House; and whenever I have made objections, whenever I have insisted upon a reference of a claim to a committee in order that the claim might receive the investigation which our rules intend matters of this kind shall receive at the hands of the committees; my action has not been prompted by any desire to embarrass claimants or to thwart the wishes of gentlemen on this floor whom I would be very glad to gratify. I have acted, sir, from a conviction which I firmly entertain that no claim of any considerable amount should be passed upon by this House without an examination at the hands of some suitable committee. From the organization of the First Congress down to the present time, with the exception of the present session, committees have uniformly been appointed to consider claims against the Government. Never, I believe, in the history of the Government until the present time have claims of any magnitude, taking large sums of money from the Treasury, been permitted to pass without examination by a committee.

Now, sir, upon this question I have only to say that the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress found presented before that committee claims amounting to $1,200,000 in behalf of contractors who had built these iron-clads. The present claim was among the number. The committee carefully considered these claims, and reported to the House that this and the other claims should be referred to a board, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, to take all necessary proofs, and make report to the Fortieth Congress. After full deliberation and discussion, the merits of this claim and all the other claims being fully weighed and considered, that action of the committee was sustained in this House by a decided majority. We now find gentlemen coming in here with a proposition to separate this particular claim from all the other claims, to make an exception of it, and have it passed by the House without any examination from any committee. When this proposition was first made to the House it was rejected—in my judgment very properly—and the case was ordered to be submitted to the Committee of Claims when appointed. That reference was I think right, and should be sustained. And when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] appeals to the sympathies of this House and asks that this claim shall be considered to the exclusion of the others, some of which are perhaps as meritorious as this, my reply is that this claim should take the same course as the others, should be examined by a committee along with the others, and should abide the fate which kindred claims may meet at the hands of this House.

Now, sir, I think that we should be careful in regard to our expenditures of money from the public Treasury. With a debt of $4,000,000,000 upon us, with the business of the nation paralyzed, with the capital of the country lying idle, with people starving in the South and laborers out of employment in the North, it behooves the American Congress to watch the public Treasury and see that these large drafts upon it, to the amount of tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands, shall not be made except upon the recommendation of some committee that has investigated the subject. I tell gentlemen of this Congress that they must begin to economize somewhere and somehow, because if they do not the embarrassment of our Treasury, the stagnation of business, the disordered condition of our financial affairs will bring on national bankruptcy and ruin. As men whose duty it is to be the guardians of the public Treasury, it behooves us to see to it that claims of this character, if they pass at all, shall pass only after the closest scrutiny.

I hope, sir, that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will be voted down, and that I shall be permitted to enter a motion to refer this subject to the Committee of Claims when appointed; or if it is the desire of the House to have action upon the subject at the present time, let it go (as appropriation bills not submitted to any committee should properly go) to the Committee of the Whole House for investigation and discussion.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, one of the Committee of Claims, for five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, I will say that one of the most perplexing subjects before that committee was what was called the iron-clad claims. It came to us from the Senate on a proposition to pay certain contractors twelve per cent. on the original contract price. Our committee, after due investigation of each and every one of these cases by itself, arrived at certain conclusions, and reported a bill in which they were embodied. Instead of providing for a certain percentage on the contract price, they decided wherever the Government was at fault, wherever the Government interfered, and by that interference damaged the contractor, the contractor should have pay for that damage. We refused, however, to pay for incidental damages arising by reason of the war. Among the cases that the committee, after full investigation, believed to fall under that rule was the case of the contractors of the Camanche. I do not know what the amount of the damage was which was claimed, but the amount came before that committee. I believe now that under the rule adopted by the committee that these contractors should be paid for the damages which they sustained. The majority of the committee, I believe, decided that this was an honest claim, and being an honest claim it should be paid.

Now, for my part, believing this, I am willing, as this Congress has not given it full investigation and as there may be some members who do not know about it, to concede that the safe plan would be to give these parties back the vessel, deducting the amounts they have already received. If that will satisfy them it is perhaps the best plan for this House to pursue. If I am called upon to vote upon the question whether it is right or wrong, and believing it to be right, I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. So far as the House is concerned we have certainly nothing to lose by giving up the vessel.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss this question at any great length. I will say, however, in reply to the gentleman from New York, that I agree with him it is very well to have these cases investigated and reported on by committees; and if this had not been investigated and reported on at different times I would not ask any action of the House in the manner which I now do. As I have said before, it has been reported on by the Naval Committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. It has been fully discussed, as gentlemen will find by referring to page 1214 of the Congressional Globe. That committee fully reported in favor of this claim. That report was unanimous. I have not time to read it. I have it here; and if any gentleman will take the pains to examine it he will find that this report of the Senate committee was an unanimous report in favor of paying Ryan, Secor & Co. $179,000. They reported that it was the fault of the Government, and not the fault of the contractors. The question was discussed at length in the Senate. It seems to me all these facts ought to be sufficient to satisfy any disinterested man that these parties are entitled to this money.

I intended when I introduced this resolution to ask that it be passed. Some of these men are poor. It may be difficult for them to get the money to purchase this vessel or to pay back the amount they have received; but it being the last chance, they are willing to take the risk. Of course it would be preferable to them to be paid the money. If I did not believe it to be an honest claim I would never ask the House to appropriate one dollar. I have never been in favor of paying out money except where it was honest and right. I believe this to be honest and right. When I introduced the resolution I did not know the gentleman from Ohio was going to offer an amendment, but now that the amendment has been offered I hope it will be adopted. If not, I hope my resolution will be adopted. Let us give these parties the money to which they are entitled, or let us give them back their vessel.

One remark further. The gentleman from New York says Congress sent these claims back to the Navy Department for examination and report to the Fortieth Congress. Now, the gentleman very well knows that the case of the Camanche was a separate claim, and so came from the Senate. It was no part of the "omnibus bill." After the "omnibus bill" was referred to the Committee of Claims this resolution was referred to that committee, and in their report they took all these claims together; but at the same time the committee, so far as they examined this particular claim, told us it was just. At least Mr. Thornton and the member from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] and other members of the committee said it was just.

Mr. WARD. There is nothing of that kind in the report.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not speaking of the report. They reported to refer the claim to the naval board, but they say had they acted on this separately they believe they would have reported it as a just and honest claim. I speak not of the committee as a committee, but of individual members of it.

Mr. WARD. There was no separate action taken by the Committee of Claims. The committee came to a general conclusion as to all these claims.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Thirty-Eighth Congress which reported in favor of paying this claim. And there are other members of this House who were members of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, in whose judgment and integrity I have as much confidence as in any member of this House. But I am willing to be governed by the report that has been made by honorable gentlemen in this House without waiting for the investigation of some other committee. The claim having been investigated, as I have said, four times, three times in the Senate and once in the House, and being reported favorably upon every time, I consider that it would be nothing but right and just for this House now to act upon it without delay, and give these men the allowance they are entitled to according to the reports of these several committees.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield for a moment.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I certainly should not have felt called upon to say anything in advocacy of this claim, but since the action of the Naval Committee of the Thirty-Eighth Congress has been referred to, perhaps it is proper that as a member of that committee I should say that they did, as the gentleman from Illinois has stated, investigate the question fully, and reported with unanimity in favor of the payment of the claim. I trust the claim will receive the favorable action of this House.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask if the same committee did not report the Forbes claim?

Mr. GRISWOLD. The Forbes claim was regarded by the committee as an entirely different claim.

Mr. WARD. You reported it.

Mr. GRISWOLD. It was not a unanimous report. The Naval Committee of the Thirty-Eighth Congress regarded this as almost an exceptional case.

Mr. WARD. I ask that merely for the purpose of correcting my friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] whose remarks seemed to convey the impression that that was put through without a report of the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman misunderstood me; I stated that it was put through the House without having a report from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WARD. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. LOGAN. But if the action of Congress in one case where there was not a unanimous report from the Naval Committee was proper, it would certainly be so in this case, where there was a unanimous report.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOGAN. For a moment.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman yields to me to state, in connection with the question of the gentleman from New York, my recollection of the matters connected with the claim, which is to this effect: that this and the Tetlow case, which was disposed of in the last days of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, were cases each having their own peculiarity, and were unlike any class of cases or any other case referred to the committee; and that in each case the action of the Naval Committee was unanimous, believing that great wrong had been done to the contractors by the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement. I was induced to make the statement I did from examining the reports heretofore made. I find I am confirmed in what I said by the statements of others. I trust the House will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert the following:

That there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated, for the purpose of paying Donahue, Ryan & Secor for losses sustained by them in the construction of the monitor Camanche, the sum of $179,000. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay the same out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 41, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Burr, Butler, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Dodge, Driggs, Eekley, Eli, Ferriss, Getz, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Kerr, Laffin, Lincoln Logan, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Pile, Poland, Polsley, Robertson, Robinson, Schenck, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Twitchell, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—63.

Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LOGAN. I call the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken upon the passage of the joint resolution; and upon a division, there were—ayes 70, noes 32.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes 18, noes 75.

So (one fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was accordingly passed.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER announced the members of the select Committee on Southern Railroads, ordered by the House on yesterday to be appointed, as follows: JOSEPH W. MCCLURG of Missouri, ULYSSES MERCUR of Pennsylvania, HENRY D. WASHBURN of Indiana, JOHN W. CHANTLER of New York, and PHILETUS SAWYER of Wisconsin.

EIGHT-HOUR SYSTEM OF LABOR.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the rules be suspended in order to allow me to introduce for consideration at this time a bill constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States. I ask that the bill be read by the Clerk for the information of the House.

The bill was read at length. It provides that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, or mechanics now employed, or who may be hereafter employed, by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith shall be repealed.

Mr. BANKS. With the consent of the House I will make this statement: this bill was for many months before the Committee on the Judiciary of the last Congress, and I believe it was unanimously agreed to by them. I hope that no objection will be made to its consideration at this time.

Mr. CHANLER. I notice that while this bill says that eight hours shall constitute a day's work, it says nothing about the wages that shall be paid for that day's work. Now, it is a perfect farce to say that a day's work for a man in the employ of the Government shall be eight hours, without saying anything about what shall be paid him for that day's work.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 40.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 23, not voting 63; as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Chandler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Donnelly, Eila, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hayes, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Assahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughbridge, Marshall, McClurg, Miller, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Noell, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pile, Polsley, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and Wood—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnes, Blair, Burr, Reader W. Clarke, Driggs, Ferriss, Hamilton, Hulburd, Koontz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Marvin, Mercer, Peters, Poland, Smith, Spalding, Taber, Van Auken, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and John T. Wilson—23.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Benjamin, Bromwell, Butler, Cake, Cobb, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Denison, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Hill, Humphrey, Julian, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrill, Nicholson, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—63.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The bill was accordingly introduced, and read a first and second time. It was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BANKS. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. BLAINE. I hold in my hand a resolution, which I ask unanimous consent to offer. Before reading it I desire to say that a day or two since a resolution was offered proposing to pay the clerks of committees of the Thirty-Ninth Congress; but that was objectionable to many members on the ground that it paid these clerks for an indefinite period. I now propose to offer a resolution giving to the clerks employed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress one month's pay—

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to debate.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, sir, I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the several persons who were serving as clerks to the committees of the Thirty-Ninth Congress at the close of the late session be allowed and paid one month's pay at the rate heretofore paid.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE and others objected.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to suspend the rules in order that the resolution may be offered.

On the motion there were—ayes 56, noes 26.

Mr. WARD. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was received.

The question being on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BLAINE called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD. I desire to inquire of the Chair as a question of construction whether this resolution does not propose to pay persons who are not in the employ of the Government.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of parliamentary law, and the Chair cannot answer it.

On agreeing to the resolution there were—ayes 57, noes 39.

Mr. KERR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House relative to adjournment, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the following amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House relative to the adjournment of Congress:

Strike out all after the word "that," where it first occurs in the House amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby instructed to adjourn their respective Houses at noon on the 30th day of March, instant, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867, at noon, when the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause the roll of each House respectively to be called; and that, unless otherwise ordered by both Houses, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, at one o'clock in the afternoon of the next day thereafter, shall again cause the roll of each House respectively to be called, and shall thereupon further adjourn their respective Houses without day: Provided, That clerks of committees of the Senate and House of Representatives who do not receive a yearly compensation, and who are not actually employed during the recess by order of a committee of either House, shall only be paid for the days that Congress shall be actually in session previous to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, that resolution is ingeniously drawn to prevent the possible meeting of this Congress until next December. I beg gentlemen to listen to me for one moment. What is to be done? The two Houses are directed to meet here on a certain day in July. The roll is to be called. The next day the roll is to be called again, and if not otherwise ordered, then they are to adjourn until December. And that order is to be by both Houses.

In the first place those who do not want Congress to meet can prevent, by staying away, a quorum from appearing. If a quorum should be present, it is not sufficient for one House to act, but it requires the united concurrent action of both Houses to make them stay, so that each House can defeat the other. The Senate has the House entirely in its power, and it may be that the House has the Senate entirely in its power. It requires the concurrent action of both Houses to continue the meeting which shall then take place.

Again: suppose the majority of the House, in the first place, want to stay here, and the Senate want to stay with them. They must be able, against all filibustering, in order to keep Congress together, to get the joint order, the joint action through before one o'clock of the second day, or it will not avail anything, for upon failure to get that joint order through an adjournment takes place. For such is the law.

It may be said there is power in the House, it being on Monday. Will it fall on Monday? By the rules you can then move to suspend the rules. But it does not fall on Monday. Mark that. You meet on Wednesday, when you cannot suspend the rules, and therefore, when it will not be within your power, by a suspension of the rules, to get at it in that way. Members could filibuster so as to prevent any joint action taking place.

It will be said, perhaps, that the previous question might prevent it. It is a poor body that cannot filibuster beyond a certain hour. We are to call the roll and adjourn over to the next day, and at one o'clock the roll is to be called again. Now, if this House by the previous question is able to prevent this filibustering, in the Senate they have no previous question, and it is in the power of Senators at any time, by rising to debate, to do this. They have the right to debate from hour to hour, and thus prevent any concurrent action on the part of the two Houses.

If any gentleman chooses to walk into this trap he may. I do not propose to do it. I say that resolution, whether designed or not, is most ingeniously framed so as to prevent any possibility, or at least any human probability, of the meeting of Congress before next December.

But it will be said gentlemen will be influenced by a sense of public duty to come here if required. I do not believe our Democratic friends will come here at all. I would not if I were of their way of thinking. They do not want Congress to meet at all. A great many on this side may be desirous to stay away. Public opinion would drive us here if we were disposed to stay at home in case any emergency should require our presence here. Then if we come here with a large majority in both branches, with the best intentions, with an honest purpose to stay here and do business, a feeble minority in either branch may prevent it. We are to meet, but how? We are to stay here until the next day, and then go away unless some substantial legislation takes place. In order to stay here after we meet it will require legislation of both Houses, which may be defeated in either by a determined minority, however small that minority may be.

This being the case, though on first impression when I first heard the resolution I thought here was a fair proposition, not agreeing to the four periods of assembling according to my first resolution, not agreeing to the two according to the last resolution sent to the Senate, but agreeing to one in July; yet when I come to look into it it is a mere delusive pretense and really no meeting at all. Therefore, if I vote for that resolution, I shall be voting necessarily, as I understand it, to adjourn until the regular meeting of Congress in December next. I am not prepared to do that. But if I were compelled to vote I would vote honestly, fairly, and above board to adjourn without day, to be called together by law in December next, rather than to walk into a trap of this kind, and give somebody good reason to believe that I was simple enough to think there was something in it when there is not.

Before I yield to any one I move that the House non-concur and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House concur.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If it is in order, I propose to amend the Senate amendment. I wish the House to understand the resolution as amended by the Senate. It requires the Presiding Officers of the two Houses to adjourn their respective Houses on Saturday next until the first Wednesday in July, that we reassemble on that day, and that thereupon the Presiding Officers shall cause the rolls of their respective Houses to be called, and unless otherwise ordered the two Houses shall adjourn until the following day; that on the following day they shall call the roll again, and shall then adjourn sine die. There is nothing about "otherwise ordered" on the second day. They shall on the first day, unless otherwise ordered, call the roll and adjourn, but on the second day they shall call the roll and adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the condition of the resolution as regards further amendment. The Senate has agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House with an amendment. That is as far as the power of amendment can go. It cannot be again amended and sent back.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I will not offer it, but will say what I would have said had I been permitted to offer it. It was my desire to so amend the resolution as to authorize the Presiding Officers of the two Houses on the second day to call the roll, and if there should be found no quorum present, then to adjourn until the regular session of Congress, but if there should be a quorum present then to proceed to business. The officers of the two Houses ought not to be required to adjourn their respective Houses unless otherwise ordered, for it would be in the power, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says, of any gentleman by talking an hour to cause an adjournment of the House and Senate until the regular session in December. It would not require any twenty-four hours filibustering, only that some Senator or member of the House should get the floor and talk an hour. Although there might be a quorum present in both Houses for the purpose of doing business, yet, under this resolution as it now stands, the Presiding Officer would be required at one o'clock to rise and declare the House adjourned.

It is, it seems to me, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] characterizes it, a very ingenious method of providing that there shall not be a session, no matter what the exigencies of the country may be. I hope, sir, the House will not agree to the amendment. Let us have a committee of conference and endeavor there to provide that we may have a session if the country demands it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose to extend this discussion, but I simply wish before yielding the floor again to call attention to another singular provision in the amendment of the Senate in reference to the clerks of committees, and messengers which strikes mainly at us. The Senate is a body of about one third the number of members that this House contains, and it has thirteen messengers, some of them brothers, sons, and other relatives of Senators, I am sorry to say, while the House has but seven. These thirteen messengers are to stay and get their pay. For that purpose I presume the seven here may be passed by. But when they come to a chance to strike at the committee clerks, there is a sudden virtuous indignation on their part.

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that that provision strikes at the Senate committee clerks more than it does to ours.

Mr. SCHENCK. How?

Mr. BLAINE. Because there are no committee clerks in the House now, while the Senate have all their committees and clerks.

Mr. SCHENCK. They might as well go further and exclude the messengers. As my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] desires to move to concur in this amendment of the Senate, I will yield the floor to him for five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to submit a motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate. And I would inquire of the Chair whether, under an order already adopted by the House for the remainder of this session, a motion to suspend the rules is not in order at any time until the House shall rescind or modify that order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would decide that should the House again meet in July next, or at any other time before the beginning of the next regular session in December next, a motion to suspend the rules would certainly be in order, under an order of the House, applicable to the remainder of the first session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. That being the case, then I desire to inquire whether it is not also in order for less than a quorum to order a call of the House, and whether a call of the House having once been ordered and begun, it can be stopped until concluded, except the House so order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be compelled to rule in accordance with the resolution adopted by the two Houses. That would be a joint rule binding upon the two Presiding Officers, unless rescinded or changed by some other concurrent action of the two Houses; which concurrent action could only be had when a quorum was present in each House.

Mr. BINGHAM. My colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] wants to adopt some resolution which shall compel a quorum of each House to attend here next July. Sir, he cannot fix it in any way so as to compel a quorum of this House or of the Senate, or even a member of the Senate to attend here then. The remarks of my colleague would apply with equal force to any resolution the two Houses might adopt on this subject. For myself I never saw any necessity for the continuance of this first session of the Fortieth Congress. I do not for a moment recognize the force of the suggestions made by gentlemen in this House or out of it, that the safety of this Republic depends in any sense upon the presence of this Congress or of any Congress for the next six months. That is with the great people who have once saved this Government by arms, and who will again do so if need be. I am perfectly willing to adopt the Senate amendment, to meet here in July next, and abide the action of the two Houses at that time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire of the Speaker whether under this amendment of the Senate, even if a quorum should be here at the time of the meeting in July next, he would not be obliged to adjourn this House at the conclusion of the roll-call on the second day, unless ordered to the contrary by the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. Unless there should be a concurrent resolution of the two Houses ordering differently, the Chair would be obliged to adjourn the House at the time named.

Mr. BINGHAM. That matter is left to the judgment and action of the two Houses at that time. They may so order that the session shall continue from that time until the first Monday in December next.

It is perfectly plain how this matter stands. My colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] desires apparently to have some sort of arrangement by which the two Houses of Congress shall be compelled to convene. I tell the gentleman that he cannot make any such arrangement. You may legislate here and pass a bill every hour for the next forty-eight consecutive hours, and you cannot compel a single Senator to be in his place here next July or at any other time. It depends upon the separate action of each House, a quorum of which can compel the attendance of members.

Therefore, I am in favor of concurring in the amendment of the Senate, because I believe it will answer all the purposes that I ever heard urged by anybody who is in favor of a continuance of this session. It is simply a notification to the Executive that the representatives of the people can come to the Capitol again without consulting him, and proceed to legislate if the public exigencies shall require it. I do not myself believe any such exigencies will arise. But it will be for Congress, in July next, to determine whether or not any such exigencies have arisen.

Mr. SCHENCK. The remarks of my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] render it necessary that I should say a word or two further. I admit that under ordinary circumstances a legislative body may adjourn when it pleases, or may refuse to adjourn, as the majority of its members shall determine. But here we, that legislative body, propose to determine now in advance that when a particular hour arrives, unless something else shall have been done in the mean time by the concurrence of both the House and the Senate, an adjournment must take place. If, when the hour of one o'clock on the second day arrived, we should be in the midst of the call of the roll to ascertain whether a quorum of members was present, you, sir, would be compelled, as I understand this resolution, to adjourn the House. I ask the Speaker whether that would not be his understanding?

The SPEAKER. It would require a quorum in both branches of Congress to adopt a concurrent resolution which would set aside this order; and unless such a resolution should be adopted before the roll-call at one o'clock on the second day, the Speaker would be compelled on the conclusion of the roll-call to declare the House adjourned.

Mr. SCHENCK. Of course. Unless, therefore, by a concurrent vote the two Houses should do a substantive, distinct act prior to the hour of one o'clock on the second day, the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate would be compelled to adjourn their respective Houses. The construction given by the Speaker to this amendment of the Senate confirms what I have already said, that a little "filibustering," a little energetic opposition on the part of our neighbors on the other side of the House, whose opposition we may expect either in the shape of non-attendance, or if they do attend in the shape of votes for everything that will prevent the session from going on, can occasion such delay as will compel an adjournment of the two Houses as soon as the clock strikes one on the day after our assembling. Now, sir, as I have already remarked, I do not want to be led into any such trap. I do not agree with my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] that with the matter in such a position we should be able to control the question of adjournment after our return here.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to move the previous question, but not until I have permitted two or three other gentlemen to make suggestions. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. DONNELLY. In my view, Mr. Speaker, this resolution should go to a committee of conference. Whether such was the intention or not, it is very evident that the amendment of the Senate is so framed that it might enable a minority to defeat the will of the majority and compel an adjournment, from the impossibility of consummating in the brief period allowed a resolution embodying the wish of the majority. I desire simply to say, as a suggestion to the committee of conference when appointed as much as for any other purpose, that the difficulty can perhaps be obviated by striking out that portion of the Senate amendment which refers to the action upon the second day of the session. The words which I propose shall be stricken out are these:

At one o'clock, afternoon, of the next day thereafter, shall again cause the roll of each House respectively to be called, and.

With these words stricken out there would be no limitation of time within which action would be required to be taken; so that no "filibustering" opposition could compel a termination of the session. With this change and the substitution of the words "each House" for "both Houses," so that each House could determine for itself whether it would remain in session or not, and so compel the attendance of the other House, the resolution, it seems to me, would be unobjectionable and effective.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, although I have been in favor of some proposition which would afford Congress at least two opportunities to assemble between this time and December next, yet, after what has transpired in this House and the other, I am prepared to accept any plan which will make it possible for Congress once between now and next December to assemble, and to continue in session if the public necessities shall require it.

If the resolution, as it now comes from the Senate, presented an entirely safe means of accomplishing this, I should be prepared to vote to concur.

It is plain from what has been said that there is a difference of opinion as to the construction to be given to this resolution. For myself I have no doubt. After a careful consideration of the resolution on the Speaker's table I have come to this conclusion: if we meet in July and do not in the space of twenty-three hours, by concurrent resolution of the Senate and House, agree to continue in session, we shall be dispersed by the force of this resolution. It will be utterly out of the power of the majority to continue in session. Any person who has had experience here knows it is entirely within parliamentary rules for a minority to protract this session for twenty-three hours or more. Hence if this resolution be adopted, and there be no occasion for a session, then of course no harm will arise; but it is perfectly plain if we are desirous of staying here in the heat of next summer that desire will be forced upon us by public peril, and if there be public peril and a necessity for Congress to continue in session, there will be a minority found to continue the session for twenty-three hours, so it will be impossible for the two Houses to concur in any resolution whatever.

I accept the resolution coming from the Senate as a resolution made in good faith by the Senate, though I do not think it answers the purpose for which it was designed. Under these circumstances there is no doubt what the House ought to do. It ought to non-concur and ask for a committee of conference. It is possible for a committee of conference in twenty minutes to frame language to accomplish the object desired, and to put it in the power of the two Houses to assemble in July next, and to continue in session if it be found necessary. I therefore move to non-concur and ask for a committee of conference. If gentlemen are acting in good faith we will be allowed to meet in July and continue in session, if required; and if be not required, we can then adjourn until December. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question first recurred on concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 70.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The amendment was then non-concurred in, and a committee of conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SCHENCK, Mr. DONNELLY, and Mr. BINGHAM as managers of said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DREDGE-BOATS FOR THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The next business on the Speaker's table were the following amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 37, to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river:

Page 1, line five, strike out the word "present," so that it will then read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, on the recommendation of the engineer department, to build and operate two dredge-boats for the purpose of deepening and keeping open the channel of one or more of the passes at the mouth of the Mississippi, and to expend for that purpose so much as may be necessary of the appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi river.

Add at the end of the resolution the following: Provided for in the act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1867.

Mr. PILE. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON WOOL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following amendment of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 47, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes:"

Add the following: And be it further enacted, That the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, to amend section five of an act entitled "An act to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, shall not be construed to apply to lasting, mohair cloth, silk twist, or other manufactures of cloth woven or made in patterns of such size, shape, or form, or cut in such manner as to be fit for buttons exclusively.

Mr. KELLEY moved a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

PAYMENT OF MEMBERS' SALARIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following amendment of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 39, in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress.

The amendment of the Senate was to add at the end of line five, as follows:

And an amount sufficient to pay their compensation and mileage to the 1st day of July next is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move that the House concur in the amendment.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I believe that is a sly way of getting additional mileage.

The SPEAKER. The compensation and mileage appropriated by the appropriation bill was under the presumption that the session was to commence during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1867, which is not the case. This gives the pay every month.

Mr. BROOKS. Does it not give us mileage for coming here in July?

The SPEAKER. It does not. It does not repeal the law in regard to mileage.

Mr. BROOKS. Because that is a great inducement for some of us.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notified the House that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the House No. 41, providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes.

Also, that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the House No. 39, in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RICHARD CHENERY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 40, to provide for the payment of the claim of Richard Chenery; which was read a first and second time.

It appropriates such an amount of money, not exceeding $8,000, as shall be found to be due to Richard Chenery under the recent act of Congress for his relief.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is hardly time to consider that; it contains an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

RICHARD BUSTEED, JUNIOR.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of Senate bill No. 99, for the relief of Richard Busteed, jr., which was read a first and second time.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be paid to Richard Busteed, jr., late captain battery C, Chicago light artillery, the sum of $1,247 66, being the pension of a captain from the 7th day of November, 1861, the date of his honorable discharge from the service, until the 30th day of January, 1867, the date from which a pension has been granted to him.

Mr. PERHAM. I hope this will be put on its passage. The petitioner is confined to his bed and unable to help himself at all. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HIRAM PAULDING.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 100, supplementary to an act for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy; which was read a first and second time.

It appropriates a sufficient sum to pay the claim of Rear Admiral Hiram Paulding, as provided for by an act of Congress passed at the last session, the sum not to exceed $3,653 92.

Mr. BANKS. I ask that this be put upon its passage, and I wish to state that at the last session—

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve the point of order until the gentleman from Massachusetts makes his statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point comes too late.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I wish to inquire if this is a bill to pay for entertaining some friends abroad?

Mr. BANKS. It is a bill to reimburse for expenses incurred by the order of the Government in 1848. It was considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs very carefully last session, agreed to unanimously, reported to the House, and was passed by both branches, but by accident the appropriation was omitted.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I examined this bill when it was here at the last session, and was satisfied it was right, and ought to be paid. I made the inquiry I did, not in opposition to the bill, but simply to ascertain if it referred to that frolic.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND FOR BROOKLYN NAVY-YARD.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 41, for the purchase of land adjoining the navy-yard at Brooklyn; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to complete the purchase of the property adjoining the New York navy-yard, known as the Rugles's property, without the previous assent of the State of New York, provided the title is otherwise approved by the Attorney General.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that this joint resolution may be put upon its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask if this joint resolution has been considered by any committee of this House?

Mr. KELLEY. This joint resolution was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate. In 1866, under the authority of a special act of Congress, the United States Government purchased this property. It has been used in such a manner as greatly to damage the navy-yard in Brooklyn; and it is in some respects essential to that yard, as reported by Admiral Smith and others. The purchase has been made, but other parties desiring the property have influence enough at Albany to prevent the Legislature of New York from giving its assent. This bill is to provide for the completion of the contract for purchase without that assent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OHIO AND INDIANA WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The next business on the Speaker's table is Senate bill No. 105.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. As there is probably very little money now left in the Treasury, I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of this bill, when if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] insists upon his motion it will be put.

The title of the bill was read as follows:

A bill (S. B. No. 105) to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The bill was then read a first and second time.

Mr. WARD. I desire to reserve my right to raise the point of order, if this is an appropriation bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. The United States has already paid a very large sum to the State of Pennsylvania for soldiers called out at the time of Lee's invasion of that State, and we ask so much less than Pennsylvania did that, notwithstanding the fears of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD] I think the Treasury can bear it. What we ask is for precisely the same kind of costs and expenses incurred in Indiana and Ohio, in defending the lives and property of citizens at the time of Morgan's raid, that were incurred by Pennsylvania at the time of Lee's invasion; and although the operations of Morgan were not so extensive as those of Lee, they were quite as active and fraught with mischief as far as they went.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman say that this is similar to the claim of Pennsylvania?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is similar to the claim of Pennsylvania, which has been twice defeated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. We voted for it, and it has been paid.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; we have never had a dollar of it. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman cannot make that motion while I have the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought the gentleman was through long ago.

Mr. SCHENCK. Pennsylvania borrowed from her own people money which she expended for her own defense. Then she came to Congress to have the money paid back to her. So the States of Ohio and Indiana have in good faith expended this money, and incurred obligations to their citizens, their people, and their soldiers. They now ask that only the actual expenditures which they have incurred, the losses which they have sustained, shall be paid by the Government in like manner. And I say again that the principle involved in this case is the same as that which has been applied to Pennsylvania and other States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if this bill does not contain the same provisions and for exactly the same purposes as the acts passed during the last session of Congress for Missouri and West Virginia?

Mr. SCHENCK. It does; I was just about to add that. And it is unquestionably fair that we should treat alike all these States—Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Missouri, Ohio, and Indiana—whose soil has been actually invaded and defended by the States. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order: that the bill has not yet been read to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order. Any member has the right to call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. WARD. I now raise the point of order that this bill is an appropriation bill, and under the rules must first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; and if the gentleman from New York insists upon it, the rules must be suspended before the previous question can be sustained.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thought the gentleman had waived the objection. If he insists upon it, I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. WARD. I hope the House will allow me to say a single word. I am entirely willing that this bill shall be considered, and if it be just, shall be passed; but I do object to a bill appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars being put through the House without the consideration of any committee. I should be glad if the House would now go into the Committee of the Whole upon this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was not aware that the gentleman desired to discuss the bill.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to inquire whether this claim has ever been examined by any committee of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. The claim of Indiana has been. That of Ohio grows out of the same raid and rests on precisely the same grounds.

Mr. GRISWOLD. By what committee was the claim examined?

Mr. SCHENCK. By the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. If the point of order is insisted upon, that this is an appropriation bill, the Chair will rule—

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that the point of order comes too late, that it cannot be made after the bill has been debated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point that the question of order is raised too late. The point must be made immediately after the bill is read. It is true that in this case the bill has not been read; but as soon as the title was announced any member had the right to demand the reading of the bill. It was probably not called for because the bill was read in full yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] how much money is involved in this bill? I see that no specified sum is stated on the face of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. My impression is that so far as Ohio is concerned, it will amount to about thirty thousand dollars. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] can, I presume, speak for his own State.

Mr. HOLMAN. From the nature of some of the claims, being for equipment of troops, &c., the precise sum cannot be now determined; but the whole amount I suppose will not exceed $100,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask further, whether the bill is intended to cover only the expenditures made by these two States in repelling the Morgan and other raids, or whether it goes beyond that?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it does not go beyond that.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is it in order to move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock this evening?

The SPEAKER. It would be if the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] should withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not withdraw it.

On the motion, there were—ayes 43, noes 51. So the House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; but before the result was announced,

Mr. TROWBRIDGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KOONTZ and HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. CAKE: Several petitions of citizens of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to proceed with the impeachment and removal of the acting President of the United States.

By Mr. MILLER: The memorial of 250 workmen of Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a law giving adequate protection to American manufacturers and industry.

By Mr. TROWBRIDGE: The petition of John Calvin Johnson, of Watkinsville, Georgia, praying to be relieved from the disabilities of the constitutional amendment as contemplated by that amendment.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 29, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday; but was interrupted by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I shall object. It had better be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the reading will be continued.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and a letter of the surveyor general of New Mexico, and a copy of the evidence taken by the surveyor general in relation to the pueblo of Santa Ana of New Mexico; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that all other business be suspended, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 63.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall have the privilege of presenting petitions and getting papers off our tables. I have several petitions that I wish to present.

Mr. JOHNSON. So have I.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of James L. Seward, late a member of Congress from the State of Georgia, praying to be relieved from the disability of the constitutional amendment. I have also other petitions of a similar character, some of which, undoubtedly, if presented to the Senate, would induce them to waive the disability in their cases; but upon examination I believe that Congress has no power to relieve any party from the disability imposed by the constitutional amendment until the constitutional amendment itself is adopted and forms a part of the Constitution. It is the constitutional amendment alone that gives to Congress the power to remove the disability, and until that is adopted and forms a part of the Constitution these memorialists must wait. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. They were so referred.

Mr. HOWARD presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point at or near Negaunee, in the iron region on the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad, to the straits of Mackinaw; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS presented the petition of Frederick Richards, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of granting a pension to Calvin Ely, on account of the military services and death of his only son, Lieutenant Colonel John H. Ely of the tenth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of workmen of Northumberland county, and a petition of workmen of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying for such an adjustment of the tariff on imports as to give adequate protection to American manufactures and industry; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FOWLER presented a memorial of citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, remonstrating against the passage of any law designed to remedy the defects of the sale of property in May, 1865, for the non-payment of the United States direct tax; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NORTON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the return of the fees paid by settlers on certain homestead entries canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office since the 1st of January, 1863; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of volunteer soldiers in the armies of the United States during the late rebellion, praying for a bounty of eight and one third dollars per month for each month of service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, declaring the existing government of that State to be republican in form, in conformity with the Constitution and constitutional laws and treaties of the United States, and is the true and proper government of that State, and of right ought to be recognized as a member of the Federal Union, and entitled to representation in the Senate and House of Representatives with all the rights and privileges of other States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PHONETIC ALPHABET.

Mr. CONNESS. I present the memorial of a citizen of the State of California, a gentleman distinguished for his learning, in which he memorializes Congress to pass an act to provide for the establishment of a phonetic alphabet. I move its reference to the Committee on the Library.

It was so referred.

Mr. CONNESS. He also incloses the form of an act which he asks me to introduce on the same subject, and as it is connected with that, I should like to present it now, and let it be read and referred to the same committee.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 120) relative to the phonetic alphabet; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. YATES. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 100) to amend an act changing the location of the capital of Montana Territory, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage, and I desire immediate action upon it. There is no sort of objection to it. It is a mere local matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. CAMERON, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SPRAGUE objected.

Mr. YATES. I hope Senators will not object.

Mr. CAMERON. I do object, because I have a resolution which I want to present to the Senate. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill lies over under the rule.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred a memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, in favor of additional bounty to the troops from that Territory who served in the Army during the rebellion; resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, in favor of securing the quota of arms from the General Government to which that State may be entitled, and that one of the forts in the vicinity of Nashville may be secured for the depositary of said arms; resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the passage of a law granting the same bounty to the Missouri State militia which has been paid to volunteers of other States in the United States service; and two petitions of volunteer soldiers and a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an equalization of bounties, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, the subjects having been acted upon; which was agreed to.

EXAMINATION OF INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs shall have authority, under the resolution of March 23, 1867, if by them deemed expedient, to visit and examine in person the Indian territory, contemplated in said resolution for the permanent residence of the Indian tribes, and to employ a clerk during such examination; and the Secretary of War be requested to give such military protection and transportation to the committee as may be deemed necessary.

INFORMATION ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am directed by the same committee to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior cause to be prepared and reported to the Senate, at the earliest practical moment, a statement, arranged in alphabetical order, showing:

1. The approximate number of persons belonging to each tribe of Indians in the United States.
2. The locality and extent of the reservation, if any, assigned to the tribe, and whether the lands are held in common or in severalty; and if there be no reservation, then a description of the country occupied or claimed by such tribe.
3. A statement of the treaty obligations now subsisting with each tribe, showing the date and article thereof, and referring to the volume and page of the Statutes-at-Large where the same may be found.
4. The amounts of money required to be appropriated annually under such treaty obligations, and the purposes to which it is to be applied; and also the amount annually appropriated since the year 1862, inclusive, for the use of tribes with which no treaty stipulations exist, and how the same has been expended.
5. The progress of each tribe in education and civilization, together with such other facts connected with its history and present relations as may present in short and concise form its true conditions, with such remarks in reference to future policy and treatment as the experience of the Department may suggest.
6. The name of the superintendent and agent having charge of the tribe, the extent of their jurisdiction, the date of their appointment, with such remarks in reference to the efficiency of such officers as their general conduct in the discharge of their duties may suggest.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it would require a large number of clerks to answer that resolution.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to suggest to the Senator who offered that resolution to include in it an inquiry as to the number of each tribe devoted to agriculture and who maintain themselves in that way. That would be a valuable piece of information, and very suggestive in legislation hereafter. A large number of some tribes are in that condition, while others entirely discard agriculture.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the resolution in its terms covers all that the Senator desires.

Mr. RAMSEY. There is one general inquiry under which head possibly it might be embraced, but this kind of information is so important in acting upon Indian subjects that a special head should be devoted to it. Still I shall not urge an amendment; I simply suggest it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the resolution will be passed. The information is very important to the Indian Committee. We cannot get along without it.

The resolution was adopted.

VOTING PLACES IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. WILLEY. I desire to report a bill of six or eight lines, stating to the Senate that from information which has come to the Committee on the District of Columbia it appears there are not voting places enough in some of the wards of the city of Washington to enable the increased vote of those wards to be taken on the same day. I am authorized by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill to remedy that defect, and to ask the Senate to indulge me by its present consideration.

The bill (S. No. 121) authorizing and requiring the judges of election in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to designate and establish voting places therein, was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to any further consideration of the bill until I offer a resolution, which will take no time, and I ask permission to read it to the Senate that they may understand it.

Mr. WILLEY. Is it for the purpose of present consideration?

Mr. DAVIS. After the Senator hears it he can object to its consideration.

Mr. WILLEY. Is the Senator in order till this bill is disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I understand the Senator from Kentucky to object to the second reading of the bill at this time.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. DAVIS. I will read my resolution:

Whereas West Virginia was formed wholly within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, and by an act of Congress approved December 31, 1862, was admitted into the Union as one of the United States, and said act recites that "the Legislature of Virginia, by an act passed on the 13th day of May, 1862, did give its warrant to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, to be known by the name of West Virginia;" and whereas Congress by an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed the 2d day of March, instant, over the President's veto, did assume, that on the said 13th day of May, 1862, Virginia was not a State of the United States; and whereas Congress by a resolution passed in January, 1865, proposed to the Legislature of the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in these words and figures:

"ARTICLE XIII.

"SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"SEC 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

And whereas on the 6th of April, 1866, Congress did pass over the veto of the President of the United States, under the second section of said amendment of the Constitution, an act entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication;" and whereas at the date of the passage of the act last aforesaid the said proposed amendment of the Constitution had been ratified by the following named States: Illinois, Rhode Island, Michigan, Maryland, New York, West Virginia, Maine, Kansas, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Missouri, Nevada, Indiana, Louisiana, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Vermont, Tennessee, Arkansas, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Georgia, Oregon, California, Florida, New Jersey, and Iowa, of which States Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, South Carolina, Alabama, North Carolina, Georgia, and Florida are assumed by the said act of Congress, entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," not to have been States of the United States, both at the time they severally ratified the aforesaid proposed amendment of the Constitution and at the time that Congress passed the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication;" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary do investigate, consider, and report to the Senate whether West Virginia is one of the States of the United States, whether the aforesaid act "to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights" is a constitutional and valid law, and whether the aforesaid proposed amendment of the Constitution has been proposed and ratified according to the form required by the Constitution and by the requisite number of States, and is or not a part thereof.

I move to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MASSACRE NEAR FORT PHIL. KEARNEY.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the official report of Colonel H. B. Carrington as to the massacre of Lieutenant Fetterman and others, and also such information on the subject as has not been heretofore communicated to the Senate.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution, and asked for its present consideration.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what amount of money has been paid by the United States to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for transportation during the war, what rates were paid to that railroad for such service, whether the compensation paid was greater than that allowed to other railroads for the performance of like services, and if so, why such higher rates were so paid to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad; also, what amount of money is still claimed by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company as due that company by the United States, and for what services such balance, if any, is so claimed, together with the amount due the United States by the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for the use of engines, cars, &c., furnished by the Government to that company during the war, and whether any claim has been made by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for damages to their road by reason of military operations, whether any money have been paid them on account of such damages, and what amount if any, has been so paid by the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but I wish to say—

Mr. YATES. I object. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania objected to the consideration of a matter in which I am interested, and which I deem very important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rules.

Mr. CAMERON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Illinois that I made no improper objection.

Mr. YATES. I object unless mine is first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

PRESIDENT'S PAGE.

Mr. CRAGIN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the page appointed by the President of the Senate be continued during the vacation, and in such vacation employed by the Sergeant-at-Arms, upon whose certificate his compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. DIXON. The rule, I believe, requires that all resolutions of this character shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CRAGIN. I will say that this resolution comes from that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be considered to-day except by unanimous consent. Is there any objection to its present consideration? If objection be made, of course it must go over. ["No objection."] There being unanimous consent, the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear some reason for the resolution. I believe it is unusual, and that there has been nothing of the kind done heretofore.

Mr. CRAGIN. I will say that the page to whom this resolution will apply was appointed by Vice President Hamlin, and continued by Mr. Foster, the recent President of the Senate. There are reasons that have induced me, and I believe the majority of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, to ask the passage of this resolution. It certainly makes no additional expense. This boy or young man will be employed by the Sergeant-at-Arms in the discharge of duties that others would have to perform if he was not employed. I would say that the mother of this young man is a widow and has a large family to support, and she suffered extremely during the rebellion. At the time of Early's raid upon Washington she was living near the residence of Mr. Blair, and by order of the commanding general of the Federal troops her house, which was in the lines protecting rebel officers, was directed to be destroyed, and was destroyed with all her property, every particle that she had upon the earth. This will be a great blessing to her, and will not be any expense or wrong to the Government.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 106) fixing the time at which the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, shall go into effect. I will say to the Senate that I simply desire to get a vote on this question. I desire to be relieved of the charge of it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I desire to introduce a joint resolution. I believe that business is still in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This motion is in order also.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. The morning hour has not yet expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, and give notice that if time be allowed, in case Congress does not adjourn at once, I shall call it up for consideration.

Leave was granted to introduce the joint resolution (S. R. No. 56) for the relief of the people of East Tennessee, and it was read and passed to a second reading. It proposes to appropriate $500,000 to enable the Secretary of War to extend to the people of East Tennessee, in consequence of the unprecedented losses of property by the late floods, such relief as is contemplated by the joint resolution for the relief of the destitute in the western and southwestern States.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 55) for the relief of Leonard J. Smith, for carrying the United States mail from Great Salt Lake City, Utah, to Bannock City, Montana Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CORBETT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 122) for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. It is the same proposition to which my friend from Maine [Mr. Morrill] objected when offered the other day as an amendment to an appropriation bill. It is absolutely necessary that it should pass at this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I must object if it displaces the motion I have made to take up Senate bill No. 106.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot now be considered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following Senate bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 99) for the relief of Richard Busted, jr.;

A bill (S. No. 100) supplementary to an act for the relief of Hiram Paulding, of the United States Navy;

A bill (S. No. 105) to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for moneys expended in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 41) for the purchase of land adjoining the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 105) to regulate the selection of juries for the several courts of the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 106) fixing the time at which the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, shall go into effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is quite obvious to me, although I should be very glad to assist my friend from Rhode Island in anything that is proper, that this bill ought not to pass, and I think that was quite obvious to the Judiciary Committee who reported against it. I believe there was no difference of opinion in the committee on that subject. It is a perfectly hopeless case, in my judgment, to attempt to pass it. If it were to be passed it ought to be pretty thoroughly considered, and it would lead to considerable debate, because the Senate ought to understand precisely the effect of it before being called upon to vote in favor of it. That being the state of it, and the session being now as I hope nearly at its end, I think we had better not undertake to go on with it. I move, therefore, to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. SPRAGUE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 4, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, and Williams—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, and Trumbull—18.

So the Senate refused to lay the bill on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] to strike out the last proviso.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to withdraw the amendment. My purpose is to bring the Senate to a direct vote upon the measure without consuming any more time. I intend to vote against it, but I withdraw the amendment which I offered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I renew the amendment. I have no objection to extending the time if the amendment be made.

The Secretary read the proviso proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith prior to the taking effect of this act.

Mr. SPRAGUE. My friend, the honorable Senator from Maryland, has suggested that in lieu of the words "good faith" there be inserted "that would have been valid if this act had not passed," and I trust the proviso will be modified in that way, so as simply to express the meaning in better language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to amend the proviso. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to make the proviso read, "that nothing in this act shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith that would have been valid if this act had not passed."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course I have no objection to that modification; as a majority of the Senate seem very much in favor of the bill, I infer—"No, no."

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no; they are not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The effect of this amendment, according to my impression, would be that any conveyance hereafter, no matter whether the 1st of June or next year, that would have been valid but for this act, will still continue to be valid; and therefore, inasmuch as a debtor may now give preferences, make mortgages of his property to defeat one creditor, provided he does it to help another, as that will continue to be the policy as long as the bankrupt act will have any effect, the result will be to overthrow the whole equity and the whole scheme of the bankrupt act.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the amendment was not reported correctly. The words "in good faith" are to be stricken out and the words "that would have been valid if this act had not passed" to be inserted. The effect is negative.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But there is no limitation in point of time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Up to the 1st of June.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, there is no such limitation. It precisely effects this; it says that the bankrupt act after it has passed shall have no effect upon anything that would have been valid if the bankrupt act had not passed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Up to the time of its going into effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not say anything about that.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is the intent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not say that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will read the proviso as my colleague proposes to amend it, as I understand:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made prior to the taking effect of this act that would have been valid if this act had not passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then what is the effect of it? It defeats the whole scheme.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish that the amendment may be reported from the desk as it stands. I do not understand it.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in line twelve to strike out the words "in good faith," and after the word "act" in line thirteen to insert "that would have been valid if this act had not passed;" so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made prior to the taking effect of this act that would have been valid if this act had not passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that would be very injurious, injurious in every way upon the operation of the act itself. It just holds out the inducement to everybody who may be in failing circumstances to arrange his business so as to make conveyances and prefer creditors up to the 1st of June. Now, as it is worded, if this act had not passed, a conveyance made for a valuable consideration is a valid transaction; but the intention of the act is to make such conveyances preferring creditors invalid.

Mr. ANTHONY. Before the act goes into effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the act goes into effect for a certain period, for they were made in contemplation of the act going into effect. Now, you fix a time ahead of the act to go into effect the 1st of June, for certain reasons, but you say, for certain other reasons, that conveyances made in anticipation of bankruptcy shall not be valid before that time for a certain period, and it is a very proper provision, because the consequence will be that so far as conveyances are made the whole object will be defeated by a very large portion of the people, for many of those who find themselves to be in failing circumstances will prior to the 1st of June make their arrangements to prefer a certain set of creditors, and usually the set of creditors who are best able to lose by them, who have enabled them to go on in business and hold out the appearance of being solvent men. By this provision they will be enabled to arrange their affairs and put their property into the hands of those whom they choose to prefer, leaving, as some one said the other day, the great mass of creditors, who knew nothing about their condition, and who were induced to trust them for the very reason that they kept up the appearance of solvency to that time, to lose all. The effect is not only to operate great injustice upon that class of debtors, but it will have the further effect of making the law more odious than it would otherwise be, for creditors thus defrauded would see that these arrangements were being made, and the people who had kept those very debtors of theirs afloat got all, while they themselves got nothing, and it will make a very great outcry. It is unjust in itself and will be in its operation, and very injurious so far as the act is concerned, and will tend to bring, if that result is to follow, a greater responsibility upon those who passed it. I think this provision is wrong in essence, and ought not to be adopted. I hope the proviso will be struck out.

Mr. HOWARD. I think just so, too. I think this provision ought not to be adopted. Now, let us look for one moment and ascertain, if possible, what effect this bill of the Senator from Rhode Island, if it shall become a law, will have upon the bankrupt act. It provides:

That the fiftieth section of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, is amended so as to read as follows: "This act shall take effect on the first day of June next: Provided, That the appointment of officers created thereby, and the establishment of rules and general orders under such act, may be made at any time after the passage of this act."

That is the first clause of the bill. Now, in point of law the bankrupt act takes effect from and after its passage, according to its terms; but the thirty-fifth section of that act provides that a certain class of assignments or conveyances made in contemplation of bankruptcy within a given time, four months I think, shall be null and void as against creditors. The object of the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt law is to set aside and annul and declare as void all mortgages, assignments, &c., that shall be made within a given time in contemplation of bankruptcy; so that the act itself has a certain effect and operation by its terms. The effect is upon this class of spurious securities, and it is to annul and set them aside. Now, this present bill declares that the bankrupt act shall not take effect, that is, shall not affect this class of securities, which otherwise would be void, until the 1st day of June. It is in fact a repeal of that portion of the bankrupt law to which I have referred. Talk of it as the Senator from Rhode Island may, its legal effect will be that. It will be to repeal and set aside a most salutary and, I will say, indispensable provision in the bankrupt act itself; and for that reason I shall be constrained to vote against this bill. It is true, I voted not to lay the bill on the table, and I so voted out of the great respect which I always entertained for my friend from Rhode Island; but on looking into the bill more carefully I am satisfied that it ought not to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. POMEROY in the chair.] The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the proviso which it is moved to strike out.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggested that amendment to the honorable members from Rhode Island because I was not sure that the bill as originally introduced would answer their purpose. At the time I suggested it and handed them the amendment, I told them that in my opinion the bill should not pass. Therefore, although I vote for the amendment, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not vote for the bankrupt bill as originally passed, and one of the objections that presented themselves at the time that act was under consideration consisted in the fact that it professed to go back, and really did go back retrospectively for a period of four months anterior to the time that it took effect, and affected conveyances that would otherwise have been valid and good. It provided that no conveyances preferring creditors, as permitted by the laws of the States, should be made for a period of four months previous to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. The act was to take effect on the 1st of June. The act itself was passed within about ninety days of that time, thereby cutting off those conveyances which had been made for a period of thirty days previous to the passage of the act. That would have been the operation of the act as it passed.

Mr. DRAKE. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion to him on that point?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. The language of the act is that those conveyances to which he refers must be "in fraud of the provisions of this act;" and of course no conveyance made prior to the taking effect of the act could be in fraud of the provisions of the act.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think my colleague is laboring under an error. A great many conveyances may be good under the laws of the respective States that would not be good under this act. My colleague will discover that it is not a fraud per se, it is not a moral fraud that is to be cut off, but a fraud in contravention of this act, that is, a legal fraud; in other words, to be judged of by the act. There is such things as legal fraud where there is no fraud contemplated by the party executing a conveyance. A conveyance may be utterly void, and is often so declared where there is no intention to defraud any person. Any conveyance made "in fraud of this act," that is, in violation of this act, is declared null and void, although it may be justified by the laws of the State where made. I say, therefore, the act as passed would have cut off a large number of conveyances made within thirty days prior to its passage.

Now, the proposition of this bill is that inasmuch as the act is to take effect on the 1st day of June next, all conveyances that may be made strictly in accordance with the laws of the respective States where made shall be good and valid up to that time. If any good reason can be presented against the justice and propriety of a measure of this sort, I have been unable so far to see it. I have listened to what has been said by the Senator from Maine and other Senators against the propriety of this bill, and I am wholly unable to see any justice in their objections. If the law is to take effect on the 1st of June, why not let it take effect in all its parts and in all its sections upon that occasion, at that time? Why make it date anterior to that period?

Senators say the bill is now a law and individuals may see what its terms and provisions are, and conveyances must not be made in violation of its terms previous to that time. Then the law for some purposes is in force, and for other purposes it is not in force. We declare in one of the sections of the law that it is in force for the mere purpose of the appointment of officers, but in another section we contradict that and say that it is not only in force for the purpose of the appointment of officers, but it is in force also for the purpose of declaring conveyances illegal and void. I say let conveyances be made by parties up to the time the law takes effect. That certainly can do no harm.

It is alleged by the Senator from Maine that if we adopt this amendatory bill the effect will be to encourage parties to make fraudulent conveyances of their property between now and the 1st of June. I cannot so regard it. It will be observed that between now and that time parties when they make conveyances are to make them under the laws of the respective States wherein they live, and I believe there are in all the States provisions declaring void conveyances made fraudulently and for the purpose of depriving creditors of their just rights. Of course those provisions are not identical with those contained in our bankrupt act, but such conveyances cannot stand under the State laws; they will be set aside; and they cannot operate in favor of the citizens of the respective States and not in favor of the citizens of other States. Whatever those laws against fraudulent conveyances may be in the respective States, they will operate in favor of the citizens of all the States. They cannot be made to apply to the benefit of citizens of a particular State and not to others.

I cannot see what great injustice can result from this measure; and as amended on the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland I cannot see that any injury at all can result. If the law is to take effect on the 1st of June, let all its provisions take effect at that time; and let all proceedings between now and that time be regulated by the State laws, where, in my judgment, they ought to be left anyhow. I voted against the act, and perhaps it may be considered that my views ought not to be received by the friends of the measure. I may, perhaps, be suspected of an attempt to make the law odious, as some Senators have said this is an effort to make the law odious. I have no such desire on my part. If it is to be a law I want it as little odious as possible. I do not feel that it will last a great while; I have thought that it will not; but my impression is that this class of retrospective legislation, going behind the period of time that the law is to take effect, and declaring conveyances fraudulent and void that were legal and proper and valid at the time when they were made, will render it more odious than any other course of policy that could be adopted. I can see no objection to the bill, and shall vote for it.

Mr. DRAKE. I am very averse to protracting debate on this bill, but the position taken by my honorable colleague is so manifestly unsupported by the language of the bankrupt act as it is now in existence, that I cannot suffer the matter to pass without a word of notice. My honorable colleague assumes that the bankrupt act, as it stands now, goes back in its operation beyond the day when it became a law, and invalidates conveyances made prior to that time. I humbly submit to the Senate that that is not a correct construction of the act by any means, because no conveyances made under the circumstances contemplated in the thirty-fifth section of that act can be declared void unless they are, in the language of the statute, in fraud of the provisions of that act, and nothing can be in fraud of the provisions of the act until after the act takes effect, because there was no such act until it was passed and approved by the President.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask my colleague when the act takes effect? What time does the act provide originally for its taking effect?

Mr. DRAKE. It takes effect, in my opinion, under the operation of the fiftieth section, on the very day of its passage, but no petitions or other proceeding under it can be filed, received, or commenced before the 1st day of June, 1867.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bankrupt act was passed on the 2d day of March. The 1st day of June would be wanting one day of three months thereafter. Now, I ask my colleague if under the act as passed a conveyance made contrary to the provisions of the act within four months previous to the 1st of June would not be declared void?

Mr. DRAKE. I consider that it would be utterly impossible to bring any court in this country to say that a conveyance made prior to the 2d of March, when the act was passed, should be construed as being in fraud of the provisions of that act, for there was no such act in force at that time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, I will ask my colleague if the Supreme Court have not again and again decided that retrospective legislation may be passed by Congress?

Mr. DRAKE. Unquestionably retrospective legislation may be passed by Congress; but nothing can be considered as being in fraud of the provisions of an act of Congress until the act is passed; and therefore no conveyance made prior to the 2d day of March can be considered as being in fraud of the provisions of that act, because there was no act prior to that time for it to be in fraud of. There is the point. If a man made conveyances in February, which were valid according to the laws of the State in which they were made, they were not in fraud of the bankrupt act, for the simple reason that there was no bankrupt act then that they could be in fraud of.

Now, sir, suppose the amendment pending, instead of reading "That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith prior to the taking effect of this act," should read "That prior to the taking effect of the original act," what would be the difference? Perhaps the act would not then accomplish the purpose which the gentleman from Rhode Island has in bringing the bill into the Senate.

But, sir, I am entirely averse to this measure upon the ground stated so ably and distinctly by the honorable Senator from Maine a little while ago, that it leaves all the time from now until the 1st of June for debtors, knowing themselves to be bankrupt, to put away their property, so that finally when they come to file their petition in bankruptcy nothing shall remain for the general creditors and all shall have gone into the pockets of preferred creditors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is simply to correct the phraseology.

Mr. MORTON. Let it be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out in line twelve the words "in good faith" and to add at the end of the proviso the words "that would have been valid if this act had not passed;" so that the proviso will read:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made prior to the taking effect of this act that would have been valid if this act had not passed.

Mr. MORTON. The amendment proposed is a very important one. It proposes to overturn a well-settled principle of law, which exists in every State where bankrupt laws are in existence, which is that conveyances made in anticipation of bankruptcy are considered fraudulent and void. There is a propriety in the declaration that conveyances made in good faith between this and the 1st of June shall not be regarded as fraudulent and void, for the reason that it at once becomes a question whether a conveyance made in anticipation of bankruptcy between this and the time the act goes into operation was made in good faith; but this amendment will have the effect of defeating the well-established principle of law that a conveyance can be invalidated by reason of being made in anticipation of bankruptcy. Now, a bankrupt law has been passed. That is a fact well known to the whole country. It is to take effect on the 1st day of June, if you please. The country is advised that the law goes into operation on that day practically. As was said by the Senator from Missouri, they are all enabled to put away their property in anticipation of the law going into operation. Now, I should like to know what is the difference in the mischief whether the law went into operation to-day and the man was to make a conveyance in anticipation of bankruptcy, or whether he makes it in anticipation of bankruptcy to be committed after the law goes into effect on the 1st day of June. The mischief is precisely the same. No bankrupt law ought to go into operation in the future unless it is provided that conveyances made in anticipation of bankruptcy between the time of the passage of the law and the time it goes into operation shall be held to be fraudulent and void.

It is said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] that you cannot commit a fraud against the provisions of a law unless that law is in force. I will not agree to that principle; but if his principle is a sound one, then it should be provided that conveyances made in anticipation or in fraud of the law between the time of its passage and the time of its going in force should be null and void, just as if the law was in force. Sir, the adoption of this amendment will make this law more odious than it would otherwise be. I make the prediction that it will be an odious enactment, and that Congress will be called upon by this country in a very few months, or in a year or two at farthest, to repeal it; but if you wish to make it odious at once, if you wish to make it offensive to the public sense, just provide that conveyances made between this and the 1st day of June shall be valid, just as if the law was not to take effect after that time. As was said by the Senator from Maine, a man has a right to prefer his creditors; the debt itself is a good consideration; that is to say, if he does not make it in anticipation of bankruptcy; but where a bankrupt law is about to take effect, and he is in a condition to take advantage of it and intends to do it, as is actually done by his taking advantage of it, then the existence of the debt is not a good consideration for preferring a creditor. If this amendment is adopted it is a good consideration for preferring a creditor, and he can go on and prefer his creditors; he can pay off half a dozen friends, give all his property to them, and then take the benefit of the bankrupt law and compel all the others to lose their debts. I say if you want to make the law odious in advance adopt this amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, there is no principle in relation to the appropriation of a man's property to the payment of his debts that will work with impartial and even justice in every case; but the rule that approximates to it most nearly that I can conceive is that all a man's property should go equally to the payment of all his debts, and that he should have no right to prefer creditors at all. The system of preferring creditors by mortgage and by deeds of trust obtained for many years in the State of Kentucky, and a vast amount of injustice, fraud, and iniquity was enacted under the privilege to prefer creditors. To my mind the great principle upon which a bankrupt bill is desirable, and upon which it ought to be established, is that it does distribute a man's estate equally among all his creditors without regard to their classes or the dignity of debts, and without giving him the privilege of making preferences among his creditors. I admit that there may be cases in which not to prefer creditors would work hardly and unjustly upon a particular class of them; but as a general rule the privilege to prefer creditors introduces a vast amount more of injustice, fraud, and iniquity than it does justice.

I think that if a bankrupt bill is to go into effect, and one of its most acceptable and just provisions is that it seizes upon a man's whole property and distributes that property equally among all of his creditors pro rata, without regard to the class of the creditors, it cannot be made to have operation in that principle too soon; and for that reason I am decidedly opposed to the bill of my honorable friend from Rhode Island and in favor of the motion to strike out the provision.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise simply to say to my friend from Indiana that if he desires to have a bankrupt bill that is not at all odious, that will not make itself odious to the country, perhaps it would be better for him to amend the law that was passed on the 2d of March, so as to have it operate entirely upon contracts hereafter made. The proposed amendment postpones for a little while at least the operation of this measure, and leaves the country subject to those State laws under which we have long lived peaceably and quietly, at least since the repeal of the bankrupt law of 1841, leaves the people to arrange their affairs and to provide somewhat for the operation of this law, and I do not see that the country is to suffer very much between now and the 1st of June under the laws that we have lived under happily for so many years. I apprehend that this bankrupt law will be as short-lived as any we have passed before. We have tried it two or three times, and we have gladly got rid of them whenever we have passed them, and I do not anticipate any better future for this. But, sir, I hope it will be otherwise. Instead of making it odious to adopt this provision, my opinion is that it will enable the country to prepare for its operation; and the largest time that we can give the country to prepare their affairs for it the less odious will the measure be.

Mr. MORTON. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that if a bankrupt bill is passed it should provide for contracts to be made after that time, and no bankrupt bill will ever be popular or acceptable unless it contains that provision. We have now given notice to the country and to the world that after the 1st day of June every man who is in debt and bankrupt can take advantage of the law and get clear of his debts. We now propose to say that all preferences given to creditors between this time and that, to enable a man to make arrangements to take the benefit of the bankrupt law, shall be valid, just as if the bankrupt law had not been passed and as if no provision had been made to enable him to get clear of his debts. That is the simple proposition contained in this amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. It simply makes the act take effect at that time, that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] to strike out the proviso.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. We had better take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. The proviso is all there is in the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I trust we shall take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and not on this question. The proviso is all there is in the bill. Those who are in favor of the bill will vote against this amendment, and those who are against the bill will vote for the amendment. We had better take the vote on the bill itself.

Mr. HENDERSON. The proviso is the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not in favor of the bill, but I rose to state that if this amendment is agreed to it defeats the bill. It will have no operation whatever.

Mr. CONNESS. It does not matter on which question we take the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us reject the amendment and take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the call for the yeas and nays withdrawn?

Mr. SPRAGUE and Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call will be considered as withdrawn, no objection being made, and the question is on the amendment to strike out the proviso.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let us take them on the final passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for them on this question. We can just as well take them on this as on the final passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cole, Cragin, Dixon, Fowler, Henderson, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Thayer, Tipton, and Willey—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Corbett, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fringhuysen, Harlan, Howard, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Wade, Williams, and Yates—20.

So the bill was rejected.

LEVEES OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to call up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 44) directing an examination and estimate to be made of the cost of reconstructing the levees of the Mississippi river. It directs the Secretary of War to designate an engineer for this purpose. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] has given to the Senate an elaborate report on this subject, and it is thought that this measure will facilitate his operations, and there are other friends who are anxious for the passage of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which directs the Secretary of War to detail a competent officer or officers of the engineer department to make an examination of the condition of the levees of the Mississippi river, and report a plan for their reconstruction and improvement from the mouth of the Ohio river to the Gulf of Mexico, with estimate of the cost of the same, to Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems to me this resolution inaugurates a policy somewhat extraordinary and quite new. We sometimes examine constructions that it is proper for the Government to reconstruct; but to enter upon the examination of the construction of the levees of the Mississippi river is in no sense a public work. It strikes me to be rather an extraordinary proposition. Nobody can tell what it will cost, and nobody that I know of can understand what the object of such a proposition as that is if we had the information. Is it expected to furnish information upon which to base the action of the Government? I will ask the honorable Senator what the object of the proposition is?

Mr. FOWLER. The object of this resolution is to have a survey of that river and careful observations made with regard to it in order that these levees may be built upon some plan, according to some system. There is no way of constructing these levees so as to make the levee principle successful unless sufficient information is gained in order to make those who are constructing levees acquainted with the currents of the Mississippi river. It will require long and careful series of observations from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Mississippi river before that can be fully ascertained. It cannot be done by any particular State, as it has only authority to examine within the limits of the State. Such observations made in part of a portion of the river will not enable a successful leveeing of that stream. If it were put under the care of the Government of the United States to make observations and survey the stream, in the course of time the whole would be reduced to some system, and the laws that govern these currents could be ascertained and the levee system made successful. My object in the resolution is for the purpose of gaining information alone.

Now, in the State of Tennessee we have no levee system at all. There are no levees there. In all the other States on the river large amounts of public lands have been given to the States and squandered for the purpose of constructing levees, but in almost all of them levees have been constructed which are of comparatively little value, because they were conducted by men wholly unacquainted with the system of leveeing. I hope that the resolution will pass. This is to some extent a national work. The valley of the Mississippi river includes more rich territory than any other stream in the United States. To some extent it holds in it the power almost of the United States at the present time. More or less of it will become fertile and become cultivated if a proper system of leveeing is adopted. A few years' observations made at comparatively little cost will enable all these States to levee that stream with entire success. I think that it will be a very small expense to the Government of the United States, which will far more than indemnify them by the success that will be attained in the cultivation of the rich fields on that stream.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, as to any particular information on the subject of the breach in these levees, or whatever the phrase is, there is a particular examination made by the authority of the Government in 1865. So far you have accurate information as to breaches already made. But it will be seen upon the examination of this resolution that it contemplates the entire examination by the engineer department of the "condition of the levees of the Mississippi river, and report a plan for their reconstruction and improvement from the mouth of the Ohio river to the Gulf of Mexico, with estimate of the cost of the same, to Congress." If that means anything, it means that this Government shall enter upon a system for the improvement and reconstruction of the levees of the Mississippi river from the mouth of the Ohio to the Gulf of Mexico. Otherwise it is impossible to conceive upon what ground it is that the Government should be called upon to make the surveys and to propose a system. The countless millions which that would involve nobody of course can tell. Having called the attention of the Senate to the consideration of the subject, I have accomplished my purpose.

Mr. FOWLER. I will simply say it is not contemplated that the Government shall enter upon any such thing as the improvement itself. I stated that my object was simply to get this information. It is utterly impossible for any State to ascertain the currents of that stream and to levee exactly against them, and unless some general plan is adopted, and some general survey made so as to give the States proper information on the subject, it never can be leveed successfully. It will take a considerable length of time to do it.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall get a vote on the subject.

Mr. WILSON. I, too, hope that we shall get a vote, and certainly hope this resolution will pass, whether the Government ever does anything afterward or not. A scientific investigation of that river will be of incalculable benefit to those States and to the country. I am very anxious that we shall get a vote on the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose there are other interests in the country as well as the interests of those States to be considered. It is not an answer at all satisfactory to me that this will be an interesting scientific examination. Now, sir, I should like to know what the Government of the United States have to do with the examination and survey of the Mississippi river with reference to this particular subject. The honorable Senator from Tennessee, who moves it, says there is not the slightest idea of the Government's entering upon the subject of making improvement. Does the honorable Senator from Massachusetts mean to say it is a fit thing to employ the engineer corps of this Government—so oppressed with this service that within three days we have passed a bill here authorizing them to call on the civil engineers of the country—upon a subject to accomplish which within a reasonable time would require the entire engineering force of this Government? I hope we shall not do any such thing.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the resolution be read at length.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not against making this exploration and inquiry; indeed, I welcome anything of the kind; but I am anxious that Congress should not commit itself in advance to the very great expenditure involved. I therefore send to the Chair an amendment which I desire to have come in at the end:

Provided, That it is understood in advance that no appropriations for the levees of the Mississippi river shall be made in any State until after the restoration of such State to the Union, with the elective franchise and free schools, without distinction of race or color.

Mr. FOWLER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator accepts it.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall vote against the whole concern with that amendment. That will be the effect on one vote at least of the acceptance of that amendment. This is an earnest proposition, and, as I think, a sensible one. We survey rivers and harbors in the United States and we appropriate millions for their improvement. It is now proposed that there shall be a survey of the father of rivers for the ascertainment of a system of protection to the great valley bordering on the same.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to correct the honorable Senator. It is not for a survey of the river, but an examination of the condition of the levees.

Mr. CONNESS. That involves a survey necessarily. That is the very purpose of the work. I will give way to the Senator. I see he is anxious.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I am not anxious. I was only astonished that the Senator should put that interpretation upon the proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator were right, and my construction were wrong, it would only make the amendment offered still more ridiculous. I hope, sir, that that amendment will not be adopted, or if it is, that the resolution will be voted down.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has been voted in.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I am against the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the mover of the resolution to accept the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Massachusetts. It is now, therefore, a part of the resolution. I move to strike that out of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment cannot be accepted.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the amendment I have moved cannot be accepted?

Mr. WILLIAMS and others. Not by any one Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I have a word to say upon it. I am unwilling that Congress should seem in any way to commit itself to so very great an expenditure in one of these States, except with the distinct understanding that it shall not be until after the restoration of the State to the Union on those principles without which the State will not be loyal or republican. We are all seeking to found governments in these rebel States: truly loyal and truly republican. Will any such State be truly loyal or truly republican until it has secured in its constitution the elective franchise to all, and until it has opened free schools to all? I submit that the proposition is a truism. A State which does not give the elective franchise to all without distinction of color is not republican in form, and it cannot be sanctioned as such by the Congress of the United States. Now I am anxious, so far as I can, to take a bond in advance, and to hold out every temptation, every lure, every seduction to these people to tread the right path; in other words, to tread the path of republicanism and of loyalty. Therefore I seize the present occasion to let them know in advance that if they expect this powerful intervention of Congress they must qualify themselves to receive it by giving the evidence that they are truly republican and truly loyal. The argument, sir, is unanswerable.

This is no common survey of a river or of a harbor. The Senator from Maine has already pointed out the difference between the two cases. They are wide apart. It is an immense charity, a benefaction, from which private individuals are to gain to a great extent. Thus far these levees have always been built, as I understand—I am open to correction—by private individuals, by the owners of the lands, and by the States.

Mr. STEWART. And principally by the swamp lands donated by Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. And out of the swamp land-grants. Now, it is proposed for the first time that the national Government shall come forward with its powerful aid. Are you ready to embark in that great undertaking? I do not say that you should not, for I am one who never has hesitated, and I do not mean hereafter to hesitate, in an appropriation for the good of any part of the country if I can see that it is in any respect constitutional; and on the question of constitutionality I do not mean to be nice. I mean always to be generous in my interpretation of the Constitution and in appropriations for any such object; but I do submit that Congress shall not in any respect pledge itself to so great an undertaking, involving such a lavish expenditure of money, except on the fundamental condition that the States where that money is to be invested shall be republican in form and truly loyal; and I insist that not one of those States can be republican or truly loyal except on the conditions stated in my amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to postpone the subject under consideration and all other subjects with a view of asking the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 63. I have been trying all the morning to get attention to it, and this debate seems to be interminable.

Mr. HENDERSON. What bill is that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a bill which the Departments think of importance.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the title of it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. "A bill placing the solicitor and assistant solicitors of the Court of Claims in the department of the Attorney General, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope that will not be done. We can take a vote on this question now. At any rate, I do not wish to prolong the debate upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If we can vote I will withdraw the motion, but there is no probability of it.

Mr. FOWLER. I will state that on no measure I have ever advocated or brought up here have I occupied any more of the time of this body than has the Senator from Illinois on the measures he has brought up. I regard this as of great importance to the southern country, and my faith in its loyalty is not at all guided by this or that man.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Illinois on broader grounds than he puts it. This whole subject has been referred to the Committee on Finance and has been partially examined by them. The subject of making the levees of the Mississippi river is a great and important subject. It can only be done in cooperation with all the States along the Mississippi river. It can only be done after those States are reorganized and are readmitted to representation. One proposition made by the States themselves is to issue their bonds, based upon the credit of the States and also upon a mortgage or pledge of the lands given to them, the swamp lands as they are called, and also other lands. There are various matters and various modes proposed not only to levee the Mississippi river, but to raise the money for that purpose. Under these circumstances, I do not think that any additional survey would throw light on the subject. We have now a volume printed, not by the Government, but by private persons, a large folio volume, containing a mass of information on the subject. I think to embark in new surveys now would give us no new light. We have all the information on the subject that can probably be obtained. General Humphreys made a survey and has given us the result of the most elaborate survey that has been made by the engineer corps of the Army. I do not think these new surveys would promote the examination of the subject. The Committee on Finance at the next session propose to take it up and consider it with the attention its importance demands. But it is idle for us to consider or propose any measure likely to get the assent of Congress until these States are in a condition either to issue bonds or to guaranty bonds, or to do something toward raising the vast sums of money necessary for this purpose. I shall therefore vote to postpone any examination or any further surveys until the Committee on Finance has acted on the subject.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state to the Senate that this matter has been referred to me as a member of the Committee on Finance, and I have given it some examination. It is true, as the Senator from Ohio says, that a report, not exactly on the subject of levees, but containing a vast deal of information in reference to that subject, is now before Senate. I have been trying during this session to have it printed again. It was printed by private enterprise. It was laid before the Senate in August, 1861, when we were entering into the war, and the Mississippi was blockaded from Memphis down to the Gulf, and it was thought unnecessary at that time to publish the information contained in the report of Captain Humphreys, who is now our chief engineer. It is a very able paper, and it ought to have been printed. It is, as the Senator says, a large volume. It has been reprinted in Europe by various Governments there for the use of their engineer departments. It is a valuable document, and it ought to be in the hands of every man who takes an interest in the improvement of the Mississippi, not only in reference to its navigation, but in reference to its levees. I regret very much that it was not printed.

Then there was a report also made by General Humphreys in 1865, which was before us at the time this subject of levees was up in 1866, when a report was made by our late colleague, Mr. Clark, of New Hampshire. There is a great deal of information specially devoted to this subject of levees in that short report.

Now, the Senator from Rhode Island wants a thorough and perfect survey. Of course I should be very glad to have such a survey. The country would realize perhaps very large advantages from such a survey. I am indifferent, however, about its being pressed. I think there is information already before the country sufficient to induce something to be done by the United States in aid of that improvement.

The Senator from Massachusetts thinks that no appropriation ought to be made until the States are restored. I think so, too. I think that is proper. I have reported a bill which provides that some aid may be given, not in the shape of direct appropriations, but by indorsing the bonds of those States, having ample security made by the reorganized governments to the United States for any guarantee that we undertake. I believe that ought to be done.

The Senator says that in this reorganization universal suffrage must first be secured in order to make the government of the State republican. I have no objection to that. I should be very glad to see something of that sort done. He further says that the common school system ought to be opened, so that all the children can be educated regardless of color; that we must not aid the southern States until the negro children and the white children are educated in the same school-house. I do not know that that would tend to make a State republican. I am not sure that the education of negro and white children together is necessary in order to make a State republican. If so, then the United States will have to go to work, not only in the State of Maryland, which I see is to be reconstructed before we leave to-morrow, but in other States, because I believe such a thing does not exist in a single State of the Union.

I sympathise with the Senator from Massachusetts in a great many of his notions with reference to suffrage, in fact in all of them, because that is all that is needed there. We can then get rid of the civil rights bill and the Freedmen's Bureau bill. He sits here along with me from year to year and votes millions from the Treasury to the negroes and white people in the southern States in order to keep them from starvation. We have had it up here again and again; and this morning the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] brought in a bill for $500,000 more for East Tennessee. Mr. President, the period must soon come when these vast appropriations must cease. I desire to say, for one, that I cannot and will not consent to them much longer. We must make some other arrangements. Now, we find that the entire Mississippi and Louisiana country is flooded again. I stated some time ago, in arguing the question of the cotton tax, that such a result was inevitable. What is upon us this coming winter? We shall be called upon to appropriate not one million, but two, three, four, five, or six millions in order to keep the people of the southern States from starvation. It is a practical question. It is not a question of republican government. It is not a matter of the education of negroes with whites. It is a question of the salvation of the bodies of the southern people from starvation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I appeal to my friend from Missouri if he will let this matter go by and let us take up some other business. That was my object in making the motion to postpone and take up another subject. I insist that it is not quite in order. I do not wish to call the Senator to order. I do not mean to be understood that way. I make an appeal to him. I insist that this discussion is not quite in order on the motion to postpone and take up another subject.

Mr. HENDERSON. I so seldom get the floor that I thought I would occupy it for some ten or fifteen minutes; but as my friend from Illinois has a very pleasant and amiable voice, and always says something that gives me infinite pleasure, and as I have not heard him for twenty-five or thirty minutes, I will yield in order that I may hear the sweet tones of his voice again. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope the motion of the honorable Senator from Illinois will not prevail. I desire, having moved to take up this resolution, that it shall now be acted upon, and more especially since the notice given by the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Missouri, that at the next session matters pertaining to the levees of the Mississippi river are to be entertained and are to be acted upon. It is manifest that at that time the Senate will be called upon to vote ay or no in favor of a proposition to aid in the construction or reconstruction of the levees upon this river; and it is important that all information pertaining to that subject should be laid before the Senate, and that information can come from no Department of this Government so well and thoroughly as it can come from the engineer department of the Senate to the important fact, that if they want to vote understandingly on this subject at the next session of Congress it is proper that this resolution should pass. It is also very well known that heretofore Congress has appropriated lands and aided both the State governments and individuals in constructing these levees. They have inaugurated the system of assistance which will be asked of them at the coming session of Congress.

Sir, the advantages to grow out of the reconstruction and the building of these levees are not for southern men or for southern people particularly. I conceive, and I believe it will be a fact, that that country will hereafter be occupied by the men of the Northeast, Northwest, and North, and that they will hereafter occupy the lands heretofore occupied by those men who have exhausted their energies and their labors in the past. I believe that the benefit of whatever you are to do in this matter will accrue to those whom we represent here to-day; and therefore as a practical subject, as one in which the southern people themselves can take no action, as they are deprived of the power of action from the desolation and destruction of their property, it is pertinent now that this Senate should take cognizance of the case to the extent that they should not refuse the mere direction of an officer or two of the Government of the United States to examine and report at the next session of Congress the real condition of the banks of that river.

Mr. YATES. I do not approve of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I think it is not pertinent to the question at issue. I should be in favor of this appropriation, of this survey, if we had had no war, if there had been no inundations, no destruction of the levees there at all. I would have voted for it for Illinois, for the Northwest as well as for Louisiana and the South or the rebellious States. I would have voted for it upon the principle that I favor the improvement of rivers and harbors, upon the same principle that I would vote for an appropriation for a harbor on the coast of Maine.

Now, sir, I have voted for all these measures for the relief of the southern States. I voted for the appropriation for the relief of suffering in the South. I voted for the appropriation, a year ago, for the improvement of these levees. My doctrine is that we will impose every condition that is necessary to secure a perfect allegiance from the southern States to this Government; we will restore the Union; we will require that they shall submit in spirit and in letter to the demands of the Government. But, sir, we should be generous, and we should extend to the southern States relief from the sufferings to which they have been exposed. I think this amendment is not germane, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the general consent of the Senate, if that is necessary, to make a report at this time from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received unless objection is made. The Chair hears no objection.

SENATE CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their first amendment and agree to the second section of the bill, with the following amendment: add to the second section the following: "And the newspapers in the rebellious States named in section seven of an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1863, and for other purposes, which have or may be designated in pursuance of the provisions of said section for the publication of the public laws and treaties of the United States, shall publish the public laws and treaties of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, authentic copies of which it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to furnish as soon as practicable after receiving notice of such designation: and there is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury from any moneys not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay for said service: Provided, That the accounts therefor shall be settled in the usual manner, and the compensation shall not exceed the rate fixed in section seven aforesaid."

That the House agree to the third amendment of the Senate to the fourth amendment of the House.

That the House agree to the fourth amendment of the Senate to the fourth amendment of the House, with an amendment as follows: in line nine of said fourth amendment of the Senate strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen."

L. M. MORRILL,
G. F. EDMUNDS.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the Senator from Maine explain the report? I cannot understand it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir. The House disagreed to the second section of the Senate bill, which was to limit the seventh section of the civil appropriation bill of last session with regard to the price paid for advertising in the newspapers of the country. They recede from that and concur in our amendment with an amendment, which is to the effect that the papers authorized to be selected by the Clerk of the House in the insurrectionary States, twenty-one in number, I believe, shall be authorized to publish the laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. That is the effect of that amendment.

The House recede from their disagreement to the appropriation for the payment of the expense of the Indian treaties, with an amendment of $5,000 to one of the items, and then concur. The House also recede from their disagreement to the appropriation of the Senate of $15,000 for the Long bridge. These were all the disagreements between the two Houses.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I declined to sign this report as made by the committee, and I wish to state in a word my reasons. There was an amendment added in the committee of conference to provide for the publication of the laws of Congress in newspapers to be selected throughout the southern States, a proposition which, as I understand it, was not presented or considered in either House, and which therefore I think it improper to come from the committee. It is provided that the laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, to wit, those passed at both the first and second sessions, shall be published in all the newspapers which may be selected in the southern States pursuant to a recent act of Congress relating to the future publication of the laws in those States, in papers selected by the Clerk of the House of Representatives. There were two hundred and seventy large pages of law matter, laws and resolutions passed at the first session of the last Congress, and I suppose something more than half that amount at the recent session. All these are to be republished in all the newspapers which may be selected throughout the southern States. According to the computation we made, this will involve an expense of some sixteen thousand dollars for the first session of the last Congress, and probably about nine thousand dollars more for the second session.

Now, sir, I suppose that in many of those States, perhaps not in all of them, those same laws have been published in newspapers selected by the Secretary of State under former laws. I consider, therefore, that here is an expenditure of $25,000 for the newspaper publication of the laws of the last Congress, and that we shall get no valuable result from the expenditure of that money. It looks to me very much like a donation to certain favorite newspapers, to be selected by a particular officer, for the republication of matter which is stale, unimportant to the people of that section of the country, and that the expenditure is a gross outrage, if I may be permitted to use that strong language. By recent law the Clerk of the House selects the newspapers, instead of the Secretary of State, as formerly.

My objection is that this is an unnecessary outlay for the publication of past matter, and not for the current laws that may be adopted by Congress for the information of the people, and that we are to pay for the publication of the same matter which is already paid for to those newspapers which have been selected under former laws by the Secretary of State.

The question being put on the adoption of the report, there were, on a division—ayes 15, noes 15.

Mr. SHERMAN. There seems to be on the division a tie vote, and therefore I suppose the report is lost. I beg, however, to be allowed to say a word. It seems to me that we ought not to republish in all the southern States the laws of the last Congress. Take, for instance, the laws making the Indian appropriations. What earthly use, what earthly object can there be in publishing those laws in the southern States except to pay the newspapers that may be selected a gratuity? I am not willing for one to do that. I am willing to vote all necessary appropriations for the publication of future laws, and if there are any special laws to be designated by anybody that are of general importance and general interest to the people of the South, I am willing to vote to publish them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The result has not been announced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence, so as to give a chance for debate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is said this subject was not before the committee of conference. The committee did not so understand it. I will read a section which the Senate inserted as an amendment, to see whether it has not some relation to the subject. The Senate adopted this amendment to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That section ten of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, shall not be construed to allow greater compensation for the publication of the laws passed by Congress and the executive proclamations and treaties in the papers of the District of Columbia than is provided by law for such publications in other papers.

It will be seen by this provision, and the law to which it refers, that the subject here referred to was the subject of the publication of the laws in the insurrectionary States. That is the subject-matter which was referred to the committee of conference. The House disagreed to that proposition, but proposed to recede from their disagreement with an amendment that the past laws should be published in those States, not the future laws prospectively, but that all the laws enacted by Congress during the rebellion should be published in papers in those States. It seems to me the precise subject of the publication of the laws was before the committee, and the only question was the extension of the publication of those laws and treaties to the laws heretofore passed as well as to those in the future. We therefore considered the subject-matter as before the committee.

Now, one word as to the propriety of this provision. It was said that during the rebellion we had enacted all the laws, and that such had been the state of the country there that it was impossible that the laws could have been published and circulated, and as a matter of fact they had not been published, and the people of that section of the country are absolutely ignorant to-day of laws which Congress has passed to a greater or less extent. It was said that we should, in justice to these people, publish all the laws which had been enacted by Congress since their States undertook to go out of the Union. What we really agreed to, as will be seen, is that we should publish the laws of the last Congress, the Thirty-Ninth Congress. It is not a great affair any way. The amount involved, I believe, is about sixteen thousand dollars, which is spread over the entire southern country, for the publication of the laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Although the committee on the part of the Senate were somewhat reluctant to agree to it, we finally, on the whole, consented to it, and it seems to me it is not a matter so important as to cause the Senate to reject the report.

Mr. BUCKALEW. One word in reply. The amount of $16,000 was the computation for the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I estimated the amount for the recent session, when many laws were passed, to be at least $9,000 more, making the amount of money wasted, in my opinion, on these several newspapers $25,000. I would have no objection to a moderate appropriation for the publication of important public laws in which the southern States were interested, in the form of a pamphlet, compiled by the Department of State; but, we know that three fourths of all the matter upon the statute-book enacted by the Thirty-Ninth Congress is of no interest in that section of country, but relates to matters interesting only in the northern and in the western sections of the Union. If we are to inform the people of the South of what has been going on here in Congress during the rebellion, let us make a compilation of a small pamphlet volume, the publication of which will not be very expensive, and let it be distributed by the Secretary of State or in some other manner. I have no doubt that if the Senate disagree to this report, and the subject is sent to the committee again, we can have a concurrence without any difficulty.

Mr. ANTHONY. I voted against agreeing to the report of the committee of conference; but after the explanation of the chairman of the committee, I think I shall change my vote, for although in my opinion a large portion of this, at least half of it, is an unnecessary expenditure, I think it would be well to publish in these papers the laws of general interest, laws that remain in force, but it is entirely unnecessary to publish the appropriation laws. Still, as a matter of compromise between the House and the Senate, and as in case we do not agree to this proposition, we may be subjected to a still greater expenditure, I shall vote to agree to the report of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know, certainly I never heard, that the southern States anywhere had requested such a publication as this. The laws that operate upon their rights, whatever they may be, they know just as well as we do. They have been in possession of them certainly since the rebellion terminated. The whole effect—I will not say the purpose, it would be improper to say so—the whole effect of the proposed measure will be to give $25,000, or $16,000 as my friend from Maine admits to be the amount, to the editors of these newspapers and nothing else. You might as well take the money out of the Treasury and hand it over to these editors for the purpose of supporting their newspapers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say a single word on the pending subject, as I was a member of this committee of conference. I did not agree to the entire propriety of publishing again all these laws down there; but at the same time there are some considerations in favor of disseminating among those of our fellow citizens who have not had the opportunity of reading any good law for a long while the laws we passed at the last session. The community ought to know what those laws are; and while it may not be of great importance that they should know all of them, at the same time it is quite reasonable to say that they having been outside of the law and outside of the means of knowing what it is, there should be published in two newspapers in each of these States these later acts of Congress. Some gentlemen have gone so far as to say that we ought to publish all back to 1861, but we do not agree to that.

These considerations, and I have merely stated them very briefly, led me finally to concur in this report, although intrinsically considered it would look, in the first place, as if it was a somewhat unnecessary expense; but on the whole it appeared to me in order to get the other concessions which we get from the House in consequence of it, to be wise to agree to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will add one word.

The effect of this is simply to give a gratuity to newspapers. It is scarcely a subject worthy of argument. If the Senate really desire to furnish these people with the laws of the last Congress, pass a resolution directing the Public Printer to print ten thousand copies of the laws, to be distributed all over the southern States in a permanent and enduring form; and it probably could be done for $5,000. This shows that this proposition to pay twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars is simply a gratuity to newspapers. I do not wish to vote for it, and I see that the Senators who are on the committee are really opposed to it themselves, and probably yielded to it only as the best thing they could do. Neither of them seems to advocate the proposition on its merits.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The statement of my friend from Ohio is not quite a fair one. I do not mean that it is personally unfair, but logically unfair, for the reason that the ten thousand bound copies that are mentioned would, if printed, go into the libraries of a few individuals comparatively, and the great mass of the community would never see them. It is so in the northern States. As many copies as we publish of the bound volume of the laws, it is very troublesome indeed, for a common man, if he wants to find out what a particular act of Congress is, to lay his hand on it. We know that the newspapers circulate among the people. Every newspaper that is published probably gets into the hands of several thousand persons, more or less. If therefore you wish to disseminate among the mass of the community as a mass, high and low, a knowledge of the laws that have been passed under these peculiar circumstances, now that they manifest a disposition to desire law and to desire to come back under its operation and to obey it, let us spread these laws in the newspapers where they can all see them. That is the best that can be said of it.

As I said before, frankly, it is open to doubt if you look at it intrinsically, whether it is worth the expense or not; but we cannot always have everything just as we wish it in this body. We are obliged to concede something to the views of the other House.

Mr. YATES. I am in favor of this report of the committee. I am for it on the principle, if no other, of encouraging and building up loyal newspapers in the South and giving them support and patronage. We have been publishing all the laws, I believe, in our northern papers. I am for extending the provision to the southern States, if for no other reason, to build up loyal papers there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire whether the laws have not been published once in some of the newspapers in these States under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I made inquiry on that subject, and I was unable to obtain any definite information. It seemed to be the impression that they had been published in a number of the States, for instance, Louisiana, Alabama, and Virginia. I do not know how far that publication has gone, but certainly under the existing law the Secretary of State had power to select newspapers in the respective States, and under his view of the status of those States I presume he has selected them in every State within the last year or two.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is to be presumed that the laws have all been published in some newspapers selected there. Now, it is very well known that these newspapers, which are our newspapers as we call them, on our side, in these ten States, are newspapers recently established which have very little circulation. The great majority of the people do not like them, and do not want to take them. The question then comes to this, whether for the sake of building up newspapers of our own political faith in the southern States we shall publish these laws there again at double the price hitherto paid, because for this publication in these States we pay double price, two dollars a page under a law passed at the last session; whether we shall select newspapers of very limited circulation, and have all the laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress again published in these States.

The Senator from Illinois says that he is in favor of this for the simple reason that it builds up our newspapers. If he had not said that, I do not know but that I should have contented myself with giving a silent vote against the proposition; but to me the idea of putting our hands into the Treasury of the United States and taking out money—sixteen or twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars, as the case may be, more or less—and appropriating it for no other reason than because we mean to build up our political newspapers, is a very strange idea, and one that I cannot help entering my dissent to entirely. If the Senator is so anxious to build up newspapers, let him put his hand into his own pocket and not into the public Treasury. Then he would show his patriotism; but it is not patriotic to rob the Treasury of the United States for a mere political purpose. In my judgment this is nothing else. If the laws have been all published there, it is a bald proposition to pay sixteen, twenty, or twenty-five thousand dollars to some political newspapers in these States; and the money is voted for no other purpose in the world ostensibly than to build up the papers. I am opposed to it altogether, and I will not vote for any report that has in it such a provision based on such a principle.

Mr. YATES. I simply propose to prescribe the same rules and regulations for those southern papers that we have for northern papers. We are in the habit of publishing the laws in all the loyal States. I cannot see the propriety of a discrimination against these southern papers. These loyal papers are proscribed in the South; they are unable to sustain themselves; and while I do not propose to confer upon them any privileges or advantages which we do not confer upon papers in the North, I repudiate any discrimination against them. I shall encourage these papers in a private way probably as liberally as the honorable Senator from Maine; but I will not prescribe an illiberal and proscriptive rule against these southern papers which are now proscribed all over the South.

Mr. DIXON. It seems to me that this is a plain and palpable attempt to build up a press, perhaps a partisan press—though I do not know how that is—by the use of the public funds. I only wish to say that I agree with what has been said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] in regard to it, and in my judgment he will more benefit the party to which he belongs by sentiments such as he has expressed than he would by the opposite.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Thayer, Trumbull, and Willey—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Van Winkle—20.

So the report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following Senate bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company, of New York, the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe, via the Bermudas and Azores islands;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) relative to the payment of the expenses incurred by the judges of election for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 43) in relation to the educational interests of the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 48) in relation to the execution of surveys of rivers ordered by Congress.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 99) for the relief of Richard Busted, jr.;

A bill (S. No. 100) supplementary to an act for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 41) for the purchase of land adjoining the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 87) to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes;" and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 50) to furnish transportation of provisions to the destitute in the South.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 105) to regulate the selection of juries for the several courts of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the report which has just been disposed of was made, there was a question pending before the Senate, which was the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him. The question is now on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now desire to report from the Committee on the Judiciary House bill No. 63, with an amendment, which I send to the Chair.

Mr. NYE. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, I desire to call up House resolution No. 51. I am sure it will not lead to debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is not to be debated I have no objection to allowing the bill which I have reported to be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made, the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Nevada will be taken up, and the bill before the Senate laid aside informally.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to ask the Senate to take up a resolution offered by me this morning. Objection was made to it at the time, which I now understand will be withdrawn. It is a resolution of inquiry only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another matter before the Senate.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to suggest a question of order. I should like to know what has become of the joint resolution that was under discussion prior to the introduction of the report of the committee of conference?

Several SENATORS. That was postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was postponed to take up another bill, which is now before the Senate. The Senator from Nevada has asked that that bill be laid aside informally for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution indicated by him.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to take up the resolution of inquiry offered by me to which objection was made at the time I offered it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to know if one objection will carry over the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Nevada? If so, I wish to make objection.

Mr. NYE. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not do that. Let me tell him that the resolution I ask to take up has already been passed by the Senate three times without a dissenting voice. The joint resolution of the House is precisely what we have passed three times except that it is eighty cents less in the amount.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I object to it.

Mr. CONNESS. I appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island to allow it to be considered. It concerns citizens of my State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island object?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the joint resolution cannot be taken up, and the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois is before the Senate.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire a vote on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What subject?

Mr. SPRAGUE. The subject suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Rhode Island probably was not paying attention. A vote was taken some time since, and the measure in which he was interested was postponed with a view of proceeding to the consideration of the bill which I have just reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is before the Senate, and it will be read.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the consent of my friend from Illinois, and the general consent, that this subject may be laid aside informally in order that I may move to take up the House resolution relative to adjournment.

Several SENATORS. That is privileged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made, the Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Vermont. The Chair hears no objection. Will the Senator state his motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the resolution of the House of Representatives, received yesterday, on the subject of adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, received yesterday from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That on Friday, the 29th instant, at the hour of three o'clock p. m., the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn their respective Houses until Wednesday, the 5th day of June next, at twelve o'clock meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, those officers shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until Wednesday, the 4th day of September next, at twelve o'clock meridian, when, unless a quorum of both Houses be present, they shall further adjourn the said Houses respectively until the first Monday of December next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting:

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby directed to adjourn their respective Houses on Saturday, March 30, 1867, at twelve o'clock meridian, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867, at noon; when the roll of each House shall be immediately called, and immediately thereafter the Presiding Officer of each House shall cause the Presiding Officer of the other House to be informed whether or not a quorum of its body has appeared; and thereupon, if a quorum of the two Houses respectively shall not have appeared upon such call of the rolls, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall immediately adjourn their respective Houses without delay.

I will only make one word of explanation, because the subject has been exhausted so far as discussion goes, I suppose. This amendment which I now offer is precisely the same thing as that which we agreed to yesterday, with the addition that it provides against a contingency which gentlemen of the House feared might happen; and that was, that any one or two members under the other resolution might, by "filibustering," as it is called, by debate, although a majority of both Houses were present, carry the hour of adjournment by before a vote could be taken "otherwise ordering," and thereby compel an adjournment, although a quorum of both Houses were present. Of course the other proposition might possibly have been obnoxious to that objection if any member of either House could be supposed to be dishonorable enough to resort to such a proceeding.

Now, I may state informally that on the matter of conference which has been held on that proposition, we have been entirely unable to agree; not as to the phraseology, but as to the meritorious substance of the views of the two Houses. I have some reason to suppose, strong reason to hope, that this proposition that I now offer, if presented to the House of Representatives simply, will meet the approval of a majority of that body; because there seems good reason to suppose, if I may properly say so, that but for this argument against the other proposition, that it might offer an opportunity to filibuster, it would have been acceded to yesterday. In order, therefore, to obviate that difficulty and to give the House, before we adhere to our other proposition, another opportunity to meet the main proposition directly, I move this amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to amend the House resolution by inserting in place of the day and hour named "the 30th instant, at three p. m.," also by striking out all after the word "Houses" in the sixth line and inserting "without day."

Mr. CONKLING. Is the effect of that to provide simply for an adjournment sine die on Saturday?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir; that is my proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will inquire whether that amendment is in order. My motion was to strike out and insert. Now, I agree that on a simple motion to strike out you may perfect the proposition before it is stricken out; but on motion to strike out and insert, which cannot be divided, it seems to me a proposition to amend the original resolution will not do, because then there are two motions to amend pending.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont why he does not take the House resolution that came to us yesterday and pass that. I understand that the House of Representatives are committed on that. It seems to me we might pass that.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. FESSENDEN. The hour named in it has passed.

Mr. WILSON. We can amend it as to the hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we are to amend it at all let us amend it so as to make it what we think it ought to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania is in order. It is in order to perfect both branches of the matter before a vote is taken on striking out and inserting. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the House resolution.

Mr. BUCKALEW called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, and Wiley—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Williams—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DIXON. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow mileage for more than two sessions of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. DRAKE. I submit to the honorable Senator from Connecticut that under the law as it stands no mileage can be got, for mileage is only payable at regular sessions of Congress.

Mr. DIXON. If that is the understanding—

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no doubt of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is suggested to me that this amendment is out of order. The resolution is a concurrent resolution. The amendment is legislation, and would require the assent of the President. It is therefore not in order.

Mr. DIXON. I was about to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SUMNER. I am against the amendment on two grounds: first, that it proposes to adjourn too soon; and secondly, that it superfluously and unnecessarily makes a new difference with the House of Representatives. I say in the first place it proposes to adjourn too soon. It proposes to adjourn to-morrow at twelve o'clock. The business of the country will suffer if Congress adjourns to-morrow at twelve o'clock. Here we are now in currents of business that remind you of the last days of regular sessions or of the rapids that precede a cataract. Senators are struggling for the floor, and some of them perhaps are not always amiable because they do not obtain it. We ought, it seems to me, to give time for all this important business, so that there should be no such struggle.

I have before me a Senate bill numbered one hundred and fifteen, showing one hundred and fifteen bills now on your table from the Senate alone, of which only a small portion have been considered; and on looking at the House bills I find one of their late bills numbered one hundred and two, showing that very large number, of which you have considered thus far only a very small proportion. Now, I do not ask your attention to these numerous bills in detail, but unquestionably among them there are many of great importance. There are two especially to which I have already referred, and to which I mean to call your attention to the very last moment you sit as a Congress, unless they shall be acted on. I mean, in the first place, the bill providing for a change in the time of electing a mayor and other officers in the city of Washington. I submit that Congress ought not to go home leaving this question unsettled. You have bestowed the suffrage upon the colored people here, and they are about to exercise it in choosing aldermen and a common council; but those aldermen and common councilmen will find themselves presided over by a mayor chosen by a different constituency and hostile to them in sentiment, one possessing sometimes the veto power, at any rate possessing a very considerable influence, which he will naturally exercise against this new city government. Will you leave Washington subject to such discord? Will you consent that the votes of the colored people shall be thus neutralized the very first time that they are called into exercise? I hope Congress will not adjourn until this important bill is acted upon. It is very simple; it need not excite discussion; it is practical. Let it be read at the table, and every Senator will understand it and will be ready to vote upon it without argument. Thus far I have not been able to get it before the Senate, though I have tried day by day. I have not yet been able to have it read.

That is one bill which ought to be considered. There is another bill of wider reach, of immense importance. It is one to which I have already more than once called attention. It is a bill to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guaranteeing a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens. Here is a bill that proposes to give the elective franchise without distinction of color, in pursuance of solemn provisions of the Constitution of the United States. By the exercise of this power Congress will settle this great question throughout the whole country. Think of it, Senators! See what good you may accomplish by one vote before you return to your homes! Here is the neighboring State of Maryland. I presume there is hardly a Senator who has not letters and papers every day with reference to the condition of things in that State. I have here a letter from a good Republican of Baltimore, very short, which I will read.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is his name?

Mr. SUMNER. I will show the letter to the Senator; but I would rather not give the name.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not want to see it unless I can use it.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a good letter, I will say to my friend, an excellent letter, and I hope my friend will agree with it:

"The loyal men of our State earnestly protest against an adjournment of Congress until we have been fully protected and a republican form of government guaranteed us which we do not now enjoy. Our people are now almost disheartened. Do not hesitate at this time as to what course you should pursue in this matter."

Then there was laid upon the table of the other House by the Speaker, only yesterday, a series of resolutions of an important convention held in Baltimore, in which, among others, it is resolved as follows:

"That we call upon Congress to protect the loyal majority of the people of Maryland, both white and colored, in defeating the scheme of the revolutionists in the Legislature, and to aid us in forming and to guaranty to us by acts of Congress a republican State government on the basis of impartial manhood suffrage."

You have had also an elaborate memorial presented to Congress, in which the case of Maryland is fully set forth. It comes from the loyal citizens of that State, in which they say:

"The State of Maryland has at present a colored population of at least two hundred thousand, and, by immigration since the war, perhaps one hundred and fifty thousand, making a voting population of from forty to fifty thousand. In most of the counties whose representation has been thus illegally increased the colored population is equal to or greater than the white."

The illegality referred to there was by giving suffrage to returned rebels.

"The House of Representatives of the United States has already passed a resolution inquiring whether the present constitution of this State is now republican, and since the colored man is now a citizen it may well be doubted whether a State which excludes for no crime one fourth of its whole population who are citizens is republican."

"This General Assembly has inaugurated, however, a movement which, from the illegal representation made in the bill itself, actually now accomplishes not only the exclusion of this population from suffrage, but also gives the disloyal population a representation for them."

Thus, as I understand it, the case now is in Maryland: returned rebels are allowed to vote; they are enfranchised; and colored citizens, thirty or forty thousand in number, are disfranchised. This memorial proceeds:

"The danger of bloodshed is imminent; the time is perilous. We call on Congress not to adjourn before settling this grave matter, which, if not settled, may startle them in their recess by something worse than the massacre of New Orleans, although not so unequal and one-sided. We earnestly ask on the part of the majority of the people of Maryland, deprived of legal voice, except through us, a minority of the General Assembly, that Congress will guaranty to us a republican form of government on the only basis of right, truth, and peace, impartial suffrage, without respect to race and color, as it has already guarantied it to the southern States."

Now, sir, there is one simple remedy for this anomalous condition of things in Maryland: it is to give suffrage to all, without distinction of color or race, by act of Congress. Let Congress, under the different provisions of the Constitution, settle the question. There are three different provisions at least in which you may find ample power; and I challenge any Senator to question the power in debate. There is the clause of the Constitution abolishing slavery, which gives to Congress power to enforce the abolition by appropriate legislation. You have already under that clause proceeded to confer civil rights. I have again and again argued, and I now argue and insist, that under that same clause you have equal power to confer political rights. If you cannot confer political rights, then you were wrong in conferring civil rights. The only question is whether in enforcing the abolition of slavery you regard political rights as essential. If in your opinion they are essential to the abolition of slavery, then under acknowledged principles of jurisprudence, under decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall, you have the unquestioned power. Having the power, I submit that you ought not to hesitate to exercise it; you ought not to allow a neighboring State to be precipitated to bloodshed if by any possibility you may save it.

You have then, sir, another clause of the Constitution which has lately found a place there by the votes of three fourths of the loyal States, by which it is declared that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States;" and by this same amendment Congress is empowered to enforce this provision by appropriate legislation. You have done nothing as yet under that clause. I entreat you not to delay now the exercise of this newly-given power; see to it that there is no law in any State that shall abridge the privileges or immunities of any citizens of the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California will state his point of order.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to submit to the Chair that the Senator from Massachusetts is not in order, in that he is making a speech which he has made many times already before to this body, and in that the speech consists of a discussion not relating to the question now pending in this body, which is a question of adjournment. I submit the matter to the Chair and ask for a decision.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to make an inquiry of him in regard to his intention—

Mr. CONNESS. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order must be determined by the Chair.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Connecticut did not hear me. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe no Senator has ever been called to order in the Senate for the irrelevancy of the matter he was arguing to the subject under consideration. He must be left to his own discretion, and must treat it in his own way. On this occasion I do not see that the Senator's remarks are not pertinent. I understand him to be endeavoring to give reasons why we should not adjourn at the time mentioned in the resolution, on account of the press of other business, as he argues. It seems to me to be germane.

Mr. SUMNER. I think there can be no question. If any Senator had done me the honor to listen to what I said, I am sure with ordinary intelligence he could not have raised any question. I am endeavoring to show that we ought not now to adjourn and go home; and in order to press that upon your minds I am trying to develop to you the necessity of important legislation with reference to a neighboring State; and, sir, not merely with reference to Maryland, but with reference to all the States of the Union which have down to this time refused to recognize the equal rights of all persons at the ballot-box. I insist that before we go home that great question ought to be settled by a solemn act of Congress. Am I not in order, sir, when I try to hold that duty before you at this moment and say you should not vacate your seats to hurry away to distant places and to happy homes, but rather stay here until this great duty is done? Sir, I am not in the habit of traveling out of the record; I always speak directly to the point, and I mean now to speak directly to the point.

In enforcing what I think is now our duty, I called your attention to a bill now on your table, and thinking that there might be some objection to it on grounds of constitutional law, I was very briefly calling attention to those clauses of the Constitution on which this bill stands. I was not arguing them; I do not mean to argue them; I was merely stating them. I had already stated two when I was interrupted; now I proceed to state still a third. By the Constitution of the United States it is our duty to guaranty to the States a republican form of government. Now, I submit that laws or constitutions which deny to any people the elective franchise on account of race or color are not republican, and they are in bare-faced violation of a fundamental principle of the Declaration of Independence. A Government cannot be republican in form which sanctions inequality of rights. The first great definition of a Republic, one which our country has given to mankind, and which will hereafter be a day-star of human rights, is that all men are born equal. That was announced by our fathers at our birth as a nation, and now at last, through a perilous history, we have struggled to its practical adoption. It only remains that Congress should go still further, and by but one further act settle the question forever throughout all the States, not only at the South, but at the North.

I have alluded to the condition of things in Maryland. I might also allude to a similar condition in Delaware; and there are other States where such an act as this would be beneficial. There is Pennsylvania, with twenty-five thousand colored citizens standing ready to receive the ballot from your hands. There is Ohio, if my friend [Mr. SHERMAN] will pardon me for an allusion to his honored State, with, I do not know how many—with a large number of colored citizens ready to receive the ballot by act of Congress. I hope that Congress will be willing to confer it, and to that end that it will not vote to adjourn until this important question is settled. Settle it now and you settle it forever; you take it out of all local elections, local questions, local troubles; you give peace and tranquillity and harmony to this whole Republic, and you place those political friends with whom you are immediately associated on a foundation of adamant. Your elections the coming autumn will be one constant triumph; you will have on your side a new-found support, an ally grateful for the trust that you have given to them. I ask you, sir, do not postpone this great question; welcome it; endow these fellow-citizens with this right which is theirs, and trust to them for a generous and grateful support.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out all after the word "that," in the first line of the House resolution down to the word "until," and insert "on Wednesday, the 10th day of April next, at the hour of three o'clock p. m."

Mr. SUMNER. That is right.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to take up time, but I wish to say that I think that we have been trifling here for a week past. We have been voting, and I have followed the lead of Senators all around in doing it, to adjourn immediately and leave all our duties undone; but to be sure to get up a meeting in the summer, at which all of us believe there will be no quorum present, throwing the whole business of Congress over to the next session. I am tired of giving that kind of vote, and I do not intend to do it any longer. I am satisfied on that point. I think it of no great account about meeting in the summer. I should like very well to have power to meet, if we choose to do so, and think it would have a salutary effect. But we have now two important bills in the hands of the Executive unsigned. One of them concerns the preservation of the peace in Tennessee. I want that signed or vetoed before we go away. Then there is a joint resolution, which came to us from the House of Representatives, and was carried through the Senate last week under the lead of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] in regard to the commissions which are sitting in certain States to value slaves that entered the service. That resolution has not yet been signed or vetoed.

Under these circumstances I propose to notify the House of Representatives, which seems to be so anxious to get away, and yet is not satisfied with anything that is done on the subject, that we want to stay here, that we want to take up and pass a bill in regard to suffrage throughout the country. I want them to understand that they must send for and call back the members who have gone away, and that we intend to stay here for ten days to come to pass such a measure as that; and then, if it is necessary to adjourn for a few days in order to wait for the signature or the veto of the Executive, I am in favor of taking the time. But this running away from duty, this hurrying off home, and then this difficulty about fixing a time of meeting, I have got tired of. It is trifling with the country, and I do not intend to vote any more for such measures; but I want to stay here ten or twelve days longer to give us time to take up the question of suffrage in the country and to put through the measure for that object.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to have one thing distinctly understood, and I believe it is now understood. The question I intended to propound to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] he answered of his own free will without any interrogatory from me. I intended to inquire of that Senator whether he expected his law to apply to the northern States, and among others to the State of Connecticut.

Mr. SUMNER. To Connecticut? Certainly. Connecticut needs it.

Mr. DIXON. And I now understand the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] who sometimes is called more practical than the senior Senator, if I may so call him, (although I must say I do not consider him more practical, if you may judge from the results of his measures,) both those Senators; I understand, unite in the assertion that Congress has power, and that they intend that Congress shall exercise the power, to enforce on the State of Connecticut, among other States, universal suffrage. That, I understand, both Senators to avow.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that under the new constitutional amendment I have not the shadow of a doubt that we have the right to exercise that power, and I intend to vote for it whenever I can.

Mr. DIXON. I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the question; I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate with a single minute of discussion on this occasion; but I merely wished to call the attention of the country and the Senate, and particularly of my own State, to this proposition. There was a time when such a proposition would have shocked this country, would have shocked the State of Connecticut, and perhaps the State of Massachusetts; but that time has passed. I can tell those Senators that if any such thing is attempted in Connecticut it will be resisted; not by force, but by every legal mode. I wish it could be brought to the attention of the people of the State of Connecticut at this moment. It is a serious matter. This is no impotent threat; it is a determination which will perhaps be followed up. If that State is to have the question of suffrage settled for her by the people of Massachusetts and by the people of other States, I desire that it shall be known, and I intend that it shall be known.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not rise to debate any of the questions stated by the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] It would take some time to discuss them if they were new, and if I did discuss them I should, perhaps, play into what but further seems to be the purpose of the honorable member, to continue the session beyond the time when it is evident that a majority of the Senate desires it to close.

But I have heard him more than once tell the Senate that the government of Maryland now is not republican in the sense of the Constitution. I have said nothing on the subject heretofore, because I was willing to leave it to the judgment of the Senate; but the honorable member's frequent statements will go abroad, and they are apparently supported by the vouchers to which he has referred; and I rise simply to say that if there is a State of the Union that has been republican from the commencement of its existence to the present time it is the State which I have the honor to represent. So far as its present constitution is concerned the honorable member perhaps is not aware that most of those who are now assailing the government of Maryland, upon the ground that it is not republican, took a part before the people in the steps which led to the formation of that constitution, and afterward a part in framing the constitution itself under which the people of that State now live. The whole design, as I am forced to think, of those who are now assailing the State, few in number comparatively, is not for the purpose of having thrown over them the protection of a republican form of government, but to get the offices of which they are now deprived.

I forbear to speak of any of them personally. Some of them, however, I may say—and I say it upon my honor as a gentleman—were in the beginning of our troubles avowed and bitter secessionists, expressed a desire and a determination to prevent the troops of the North from coming to the capital for its defense; and another determination, that if the South succeeded in its effort to establish a separate government, it was the interest and the duty of Maryland to become a part of that other government. But now, because they are out of power, they have, as I think, the madness to assail the government which has protected them as anti-republican, with no other view, in my judgment, than to bring themselves into power; numbering in comparison with those who are now the supporters of the State government not one in ten.

I take this occasion also to say that he, whoever he may be, who assails the people sustaining the government of Maryland, who now constitute so large a majority of her citizens, upon the ground that they would offer violence to any human being within her limits, utters a base slander. There is no State in the Union where private rights, rights of person and rights of property, are more amply protected. There is no judiciary in the land whose duties are more honestly and impartially administered. I say this only to guard against the impression which the learned member may have created in the public mind out of the State, that there is a condition of things existing in Maryland not only anti-republican, but full of danger to the life and property of those who are not a part of the majority of her people.

When the time comes, if the time shall come, when it may be proposed to take her under the absolute charge of the Government, to convert her into a territory, and to extend the military power over her to that end, I hope to be heard, and I will be heard, unless in the mean time the honorable member from Massachusetts shall esteem it his duty to move to have me expelled from this Chamber upon the ground that the State which I am claiming to represent is not a republican State, and shall succeed in that motion.

Mr. DRAKE. This discussion has taken a range that certainly was not anticipated when the proposition was first brought before the Senate. I desire, if it be in order, in reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maryland, to read two or three paragraphs from a speech made yesterday in the House of Representatives by a distinguished Representative in that body from the State of Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that that is in order, but I have no objection if the Senate have none.

Mr. DRAKE. It will take but a moment, and with the permission of the Senate I will read—

Mr. JOHNSON. It may compel me to reply, and I am unwilling to comment on the conduct of any member of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose the Senator from Missouri has a right to read the remarks referred to as a part of his argument.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish, as this discussion, although exceedingly interesting, has no possible reference to the matter under consideration, that we may be allowed to take the vote on the question, so that the resolution may go back to the House of Representatives, and then I shall have no objection to the discussion going on.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We might meet this evening for the purpose of hearing the speeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to enforce a rule that every man who speaks should be compelled to stay here until every one else had got through. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. I understand the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to say that there is a bill pending here which has reference to the state of things in the State of Maryland.

Mr. SUMNER. A general bill giving suffrage to all without distinction.

Mr. DRAKE. And in the course of the discussion on that subject as a reason for our not adjourning, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts made some remarks with regard to the State of Maryland and the condition of things there in reference to the right of suffrage. The honorable Senator from Maryland replies to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and indignantly repels the charge that there is not a republican form of government in the State of Maryland. Now, sir, I have a word to say on that subject, and as it has been better said by a very distinguished gentleman from Maryland than I could say it, I will for two or three minutes trespass upon the time of the Senate to read what that honored Representative from that State said yesterday in the Hall of the House of Representatives as a part of my argument in this case. He said:

"I utterly deny here—I have denied it for thirty years of my life—that there is a republican government in Maryland. This tyranny and oppression no free people ought to submit to."

"Let me speak of these inequalities a little in detail. There are one hundred and fifty thousand, I suppose—I speak in round numbers, for I speak without premeditation or research—there are about one hundred and fifty thousand free white inhabitants located in these fifteen counties of Maryland where settlements were first made, while there are in other parts of the State five hundred thousand. These counties with one hundred and fifty thousand free white inhabitants have fifteen members of the Senate of Maryland out of twenty four, nearly two-thirds of that body. No law can be passed by that body without the consent of this one fifth. No law can be repealed without the consent of this one fifth part of Maryland."

"Under such a government the majority cannot rule in any of its departments. No matter how fixed, calm, deliberate, and unalterable may be that will of the majority, it can neither prevail in the legislative, executive, nor judicial departments of the government. Is such a government to be deemed republican in this age? Can gentlemen who surround me, and whose thoughts can go back to the character of their own State institutions, and compare them with the institutions as I have thus rapidly sketched, and tell me they are republican in form?"

The honorable Senator from Maryland has repelled with somewhat of indignation the charge that that State has not a republican form of government. With all respect to that distinguished gentleman, I take it that if these facts stated by a Representative on the floor of the other House yesterday be true, there is not a republican form of government in Maryland.

Mr. CONNESS. If the resolution concerning adjournment is still before the Senate I should like very much to have the Senate come to a vote upon it. I ask the Chair what is the question pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. CONNESS. Concerning the resolution of adjournment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the amendment be read again.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in the second line of the House resolution to strike out the words "Friday, the 29th instant, at three o'clock, p. m." and insert "Wednesday, the 10th of April next, at the hour of three p. m."

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. SUMNER asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Drake, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, and Saulsbury—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the question is taken on that, I desire to move to amend the House resolution by striking out "Friday the 29th," and inserting "Saturday, the 30th."

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to move still another amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One at a time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my amendment for the present; I can offer it afterward in case the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is voted down.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move to amend the amendment by inserting "five o'clock Saturday afternoon" instead of "twelve o'clock noon," so that we shall have five hours more for work. ["Oh, no."] To accommodate Senators, I will say four o'clock Saturday afternoon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend from Massachusetts if that being done he will vote for the proposition?

Mr. SUMNER. No; I shall not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I hope it will not be done.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Drake, Harlan, Howard, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Davis, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, and Saulsbury—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask that the joint resolution lie upon the table for the present. I shall call it up hereafter.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill mentioned by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] is now before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. NYE. I hope not. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he will not allow me to call up House joint resolution No. 51. It will not take a minute.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators all around me have resolutions that they wish to have considered, and we must go into executive session.

Mr. NYE. This will not take a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—yeas 22, nays 14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

Mr. NYE. While the doors are being closed, I ask the Senate to take up House joint resolution No. 51. I know there will be no vote against it. A similar resolution has already passed the Senate two or three times. It will not take a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know what it is.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the iron-clad monitor Comanche.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to its present consideration?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it be read in full for information, so that we may know whether to object or not.

Mr. CONNESS. It is the same resolution that has passed here twice unanimously.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it be read at length.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. It appropriates for the purpose of paying Donahue, Ryan & Secor for losses sustained by them in the construction of the monitor Comanche the sum of $179,000, and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay them that sum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to know how that came before the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. We are now in executive session, and I feel compelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The doors are not yet closed.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the consent of the Senate to allow me to have passed a resolution of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing further can be done. We are now in executive session.

After some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution for an adjournment of the two Houses at three o'clock on Saturday, March 30, to the first Wednesday of July, each House then to meet for five successive days, and if a quorum of both Houses should not then appear, to adjourn without day.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company, of New York, the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe via the Bermudas and Azores islands.

A bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867;

A bill (S. No. 105) to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 48) in relation to the educational interests of the District of Columbia.

HOOR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at ten o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

MONITOR COMANCHE.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the iron-clad monitor Comanche was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state that this resolution has been already passed several times by the Senate; it has undergone the investigation of the Committee on Naval Affairs and received the approval of the chairman of that committee, [Mr. GRIMES.]

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to inquire whether this is the same bill that has been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs and passed here two or three times?

Mr. CONNESS. Precisely the same, only the sum is eighty cents less. In all other respects it is precisely the same.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is exactly what we passed before unanimously.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to take up the joint resolution in reference to surveys of the Mississippi river, which was under consideration this morning.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 29, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BRYNTON.

ABSENCE OF THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. Previous to the reading of the Journal the Chair will state that he will be compelled to be absent for the most of this day on account of the dangerous illness of a member of his family, and under the rule authorizing him to designate a member to preside temporarily during the day he will appoint Mr. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts. He will return to the House during the day to sign enrolled bills.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

OHIO AND INDIANA WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore stated that the first business in order was on ordering the engrossment and third reading of the bill of the Senate No. 105, to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion, on which the previous question had been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CHANLER. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. But first I ask that it shall be read in full, so we may know what we are voting on.

Mr. WARD. I ask members to pay attention to it.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that immediately after the passage of this act the President shall appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who are not residents of the State of Indiana, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the amount of moneys expended by the State of Indiana in enrolling, equipping, subsisting, transporting, and paying such State forces as were called into service in said State since the 1st day of January, 1862, to act in concert with the forces of the United States in the suppression of the rebellion against the United States.

The second section provides that the commissioners so appointed shall proceed, subject to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, at once to examine all the items of expenditure made by the State for the purposes therein named, allowing only for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, equipping, subsisting, transporting, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Government at the request of the United States department commander commanding the district in which Indiana may at the time have been included, or by the express order, consent, or concurrence of such commander, or which may have been employed or used in suppressing rebellion in said State. No allowance is to be made for any troops who did not perform actual military service in full concert and cooperation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders.

It is provided in the third section that in making up the accounts the commissioners shall, for the convenience of the accounting officers of the Government, state separately the amounts expended respectively for enrolling, equipping, arming, subsisting, transporting, and paying the troops.

The fourth section directs that in the adjustment of accounts under this act the commissioners shall not allow for any expenditures or compensation for service at a rate greater than was at the time authorized by the laws of the United States and the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War in similar cases.

It is provided in the fifth section that so soon as the commissioners shall have made up the account and ascertained the balance they shall make written report, showing the different items of expenditure, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be examined by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, who are to audit the accounts as in ordinary cases; and if it should appear that any sum remains due to the State, the Secretary of the Treasury is to draw his warrant for the sum, payable to the Governor of the State, and deliver it to him.

The sixth section provides that the commissioners shall, before proceeding to the discharge of their duties, be sworn that they will carefully examine the accounts existing between the United States and the State of Indiana, and that they will to the best of their ability make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof. For their services they are to receive such compensation as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding ten dollars per day for each commissioner.

The seventh section appropriates a sufficient sum to carry the act into effect.

In the eighth section the provisions of the act are extended in every respect to the State of Ohio. The same proceedings are to be had for determining the amount due that State; and a sufficient sum is appropriated to pay the amount when ascertained, under the limitations and restrictions of this act.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to move to refer this bill with instructions?

Mr. HOLMAN. The main question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not in order, the main question having been ordered.

Mr. WARD. Have gentlemen any objection to a discussion of the bill for a short time?

Mr. EGGLESTON. I object.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a point of order, and my point of order is this: yesterday when this bill came before the House I made the point of order that under the rules it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union as it contained an appropriation; but I was asked to withdraw my objection, and I stated I would do so if we could have an opportunity to debate the bill in the House. The gentleman from Ohio said certainly, and it was my understanding there should be an opportunity for debate after the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that that is not a point of order.

Mr. WARD. I move then to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that that motion be laid on the table.

Mr. WARD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 56, nays 32, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Getz, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kerr, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Marshall, McClurg, Miller, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Plants, Polsley, Schenck, Shanks, Taylor, Twitchell, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Weller, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Blair, Broomall, Chanler, Cornell, Cullom, Fields, Griswold, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Koonz, Marvin, Mercur, Morrissey, Noell, Perham, Poland, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Van Auker, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—32.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Calk, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Dawes, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Haight, Harding, Hill, Hulburd, Humphrey, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, Orth, Paine, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—76.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. TROWBRIDGE stated he was paired with Mr. HUNTER, and that the latter would vote for while he would vote against the measure.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CHANLER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. I rise to a point of order. This is a bill to reimburse Indiana for expenses incurred in repelling invasion. Under the ruling of the Supreme Court in the Milligan case there was no invasion. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain that as a point of order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 36, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Kerr, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, McClurg, Miller, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Peters, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Schenck, Shanks, Twitchell, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Weller, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Baldwin, Benton, Blair, Broomall, Chanler, Cornell, Ela, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hopkins, Ketcham, Koonz, Marvin, Mercur, Morrissey, Perham, Phelps, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Van Auker, Ward, and Thomas Williams—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Areher, Barnes, Beaman, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Calk, Churchill, Cobb, Covode, Dawes, Denison, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Haight, Harding, Hill, Hooper, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrell, Newcomb, Noell, Orth, Paine, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—71.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURORS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to regulate the selection of jurors for the civil courts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask it to be reported, reserving the privilege of objecting.

The bill was reported. It provides that all grand and petit jurors, to serve either in the criminal, circuit, or district courts in and for the District of Columbia, shall be selected and designated by the judges of elections for the cities of Washington and Georgetown in such manner and at such times as the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or a majority of the judges thereof, may determine; provided that the persons so designated shall be citizens of the United States, resident within said District, and shall be returned as the said judges may direct upon writs of venire facias. And when, by reason of challenge or other cause, there shall not be a sufficient grand or petit jury, the marshal or his deputy shall, by order of the court wherein such defect of jurors shall happen, return jurymen de talibus circumstantibus sufficient to supply such defect; but in case the marshal and his deputy are interested in the event of the cause, or not indifferent, the jurors aforesaid may be returned by such disinterested person as the court shall appoint, and to which person the court shall first administer an oath or affirmation that he will truly and impartially make such returns.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me we ought not to take up a bill of this character so late in the session and so many members absent. Has this subject ever been before a committee of the House?

Mr. INGERSOLL. This bill was passed by the House during the latter part of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and failed in the Senate for want of time. It is now presented with the recommendation of the members of the Judiciary Committee. There is a necessity for such a law as this in the District of Columbia, and if the gentleman has any doubt about it I will make a brief explanation of that necessity.

As the law now stands, the juries, both grand and petit, are obtained in this way, namely, the clerk of the city corporation of Georgetown, the clerk of the levy court of Washington county, and the register of the city of Washington, on the 1st day of February every year, put into a box some five hundred and twenty names, selected by themselves. From this box of names the clerk of the supreme court of the District is first to take out twenty-three names of persons to serve as grand jurors for the March term of the criminal court, and twenty-six other names for the petit jury for that term, also for the next ensuing term of the circuit court for trials à nisi prius twenty-six more names. And so, just before the commencement of each term of the criminal or civil term, the same proceeding is had of drawing from this box. It sometimes happens that owing to a great many capital cases, in which twenty peremptory challenges are allowed, this box becomes exhausted, and in the latter terms of the court there can be no juries had. A year ago the criminal court had to adjourn from time to time through the entire month of December till a bill to provide relief could be passed through Congress. The present bill so changes the law as to give to the judges of election, who are presumed to be better acquainted with all the people, the power of selecting the names from which the jurors are to be drawn, and allows the court to prescribe such rules as will have all portions of the District of Columbia represented in the juries, and also to avoid the necessity of resorting to special legislation to get a jury when the box should have become exhausted.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House joint resolution No. 50, to furnish transportation of provisions to the destitute in the South.

The message further announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the House concurrent resolution in relation to the adjournment of Congress, and had agreed to the committee of conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. FESSENDEN, and Mr. HOWARD the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CALVIN ELY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking Congress to grant a pension to Calvin Ely, a blind man, of Dodge county, Wisconsin, on account of the military services and death of his only son, Lieutenant Colonel John H. Ely, of the tenth regiment Wisconsin volunteer infantry; which was ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when appointed.

MICHAEL FISHER.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Michael Fisher, of St. Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed.

MRS. ELIZA FITCH.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, asked and obtained leave for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mrs. Eliza Fitch.

PUEBLO OF SANTA ANA, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 22, 1854, certain papers relative to the pueblo of Santa Ana, in New Mexico; which was ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands when appointed.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the rules be suspended, in order that the House may proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COOK and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 68, noes 16.

So (two thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT.

The first business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 43, in relation to the educational interests of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It directs the Commissioner of Education to ascertain the number of children resident in the District of Columbia over the age of six years and under the age of eighteen years, the number of deaf, blind, and dumb, the number and character of public school-houses, number of teachers, number of pupils in attendance, number and character of school libraries, character of text-books used, average period per annum each pupil is taught and cost of tuition, with incidental expenses of select schools, and to report the same to Congress at its next session, with his opinion of the relative efficiency of the system now in force in the District of Columbia, and whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the advantages of said system to all the said children.

Mr. WELKER. I call the previous question on the third reading of this joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was read the third time.

Mr. WELKER. I call the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENTS DUE COLORED SOLDIERS, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 21, in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, provides in the first section that all checks and Treasury certificates to be issued in the settlement of claims for pay, bounty, prize money, or other moneys due to colored soldiers, sailors, or marines, or their legal representatives, now residing, or who may have resided, in any State in which slavery existed in the year 1860, the claim for which has been or may be prosecuted by an agent or attorney, shall be made payable to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, who shall pay the agent or attorney his lawful fees and expenses, and shall hold the balance subject to the order of the claimants on satisfactory identification. But no money is to be paid to any person except the claimant or his or her legal representatives, if deceased; nor is any power of attorney, transfer, or assignment of the amount of said claims, or any part thereof, to be recognized or allowed by the Commissioner; or by any officer or agent acting under him; and it is to be the duty of the Commissioner, the officers, and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau to facilitate as far as possible the discovery, identification, and payment of the claimants.

The second section provides that the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau shall be held responsible for the safe custody and faithful disbursement of the funds intrusted to him. In settling with the attorney or agent of the claimant strict compliance with the scale of fees prescribed by the second section of a joint resolution approved June 20, 1866, entitled "Joint resolution amendatory of a joint resolution respecting bounties to colored soldiers and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs," approved June 15, 1866, is in every case to be required and enforced; and if any attorney or agent shall, in addition to the notarial fees and expenses of collecting such claim, demand repayment for money loaned or advanced to any claimant, he is to be required to make oath to the date and amount of such loan or advance, or payment of the fees and expenses is to be withheld; and when the claimant shall have been properly identified, and his account is ready for settlement, the balance due is to be paid in current funds, and not in checks or drafts.

The third section provides that all moneys held or disbursed under the provisions of this resolution shall be held and disbursed under the laws and rules and regulations covering other disbursing officers of the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that this bill be laid over informally, as a number of the members of the committee to which it appropriately belongs are not now present.

Mr. CHANLER. I make the point of order that the bill contains an appropriation and must under the rules go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe there is no appropriation in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that there is no appropriation in the bill, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust that the bill will be passed over for the present informally.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee is not yet appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean when appointed; for there is no reason why the bill should be passed at this time. It contains some provisions which ought certainly to be considered by a committee of this House.

Mr. CHANLER. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, and modifying my original motion move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on the motion to refer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana as objecting to the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] which requires unanimous consent, that the bill be laid aside informally.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think there can be no objection to this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose there are quite a number of objections to it. Its provisions have scarcely been distinctly heard amid the confusion prevailing at the present time, when, in view of our speedy adjournment, members are preparing to leave the capital, rather than attending to the ordinary performance of legislative business. The bill contains some provisions which I think ought to be considered by some appropriate committee.

How far Congress is justifiable in imposing restrictions upon the class of people referred to in the resolution may be a question of considerable moment. The resolution proposes to take all the pay and bounty due to this class of soldiers and place it under the control of the Freedmen's Bureau. The manner in which the power conferred is to be exercised is not clearly defined. The resolution provides virtually for the annulment of all contracts which these freedmen have made with reference to the collection of their pay and bounty. The exact manner in which these contracts are to be carried out may become a matter of some moment. I trust that a measure of so much importance, and in reference to which there exists no imperative necessity for action at this time, will be referred, so that it may be acted upon intelligently.

Mr. GARFIELD. This resolution, as I understand it, proposes simply to authorize the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau to take charge of the collection and payment of the pay and bounties due colored soldiers and sailors. Instead of allowing them to be swindled by claim agents, or to take their chances among the lawyers of the country, the bill directs the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau to take in charge the payment of the bounty due to colored soldiers and sailors. It directs the business shall be done under the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. It seems to me important and free from all objection; and if of any value at all, it needs to be in operation during the coming year, when these bounties are to be paid. To postpone it to the next session of Congress is to deny to these people the privilege of having the protection of the Freedmen's Bureau thrown around their claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the position in which the colored soldiers and seamen have been placed by the action of Congress, declaring them competent to discharge the highest duty of citizens, this proposition to place them under guardianship, to put their money where they can have no control over it, seems to me to be very remarkable. There are a large number of these persons who were at different times enrolled in the Army and Navy. In what manner are they to receive this money from the Freedmen's Bureau? Under what rules and regulations is it to be paid? Under this bill when do you propose to give these men the control of the amount due to them from the Government?

If I understood the bill on its reading, it contains no provision except one, that the money due this class of persons, instead of being paid to those entitled to receive it, is to be paid into the Freedmen's Bureau. When and how and under what regulations is the colored soldier and sailor to receive his money? That is not provided for in any specific or definite manner. A mere discretion is conferred on the Freedmen's Bureau.

I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] it is a monstrous assumption that men recognized by law as citizens of the United States, possessing all the rights and privileges of citizenship, are to be denied the privilege of controlling the money to which they are entitled for service to the Government, the fruits of their own labor. It is a startling proposition.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, my objection to the reference by this bill of this money to the Freedmen's Bureau is grounded upon the reasons stated by the gentleman from Indiana, but it goes further than he does. If this plan is carried out a conflict, a collision in the practical working of that bureau is likely to take place, injurious to the bureau. That bureau was created for a specific object. That object is provided by law. It is clearly established with defined powers. The purpose for which it was established was not of a military character. It was established for the protection of labor in the South, with a collateral provision for refugees of the white race who from necessity may apply to that bureau for relief, owing to the fact that the civil organizations and eleemosynary establishments of the South are unable to reach the necessity of the case.

Now, sir, this bill proposes in face of the specific organization of the Freedmen's Bureau, as an eleemosynary establishment, established for the protection of free labor, to put the soldier and sailor who happens by the misfortune of nature or by the blessing of nature to be colored in a classification distinct from his fellow-soldiers and sailors of the United States service. You remind me continually of the fact that he has been a slave, or his race has been enslaved. You take this man at once out of the peculiar line of duty in which he is engaged in the service of the United States and put him with those who are simply laborers. There is nothing consistent, reasonable, or necessary in this reference to the Freedmen's Bureau.

Now, sir, there is a place where this bill could receive the proper attention and care it deserves. There is a department to which it can be referred; and it strikes me as an effort on the part of the gentlemen of the Military Committee to relieve the officers of the United States having charge of the payment of soldiers of the United States from offensive contact with these colored men. It is wrong. It is an unfair insinuation against officers in command of these troops. It certainly is unfair to the colored soldier and sailor.

The provisions of this bill are not understood; I do not mean to delay it if it is right; but I hope it will be referred to the proper committee for consideration and report.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think I have the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think I have it; but I am very glad to give the gentleman an opportunity to speak.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana has satisfied me that this resolution ought to pass. The object of it is to protect the colored soldiers against the fraudulent devices by which their small bounties are taken away from them. We have passed bills for the protection of white soldiers, not exactly like this, but having the same end in view, for the protection of men who from infancy have had the benefit of our common schools, and have acquired all that sharpness and self-reliance that come from the rough and tumble of American life.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to ask a question: whether all the laws and regulations which have been designed to protect the white soldiers from the unjust demands and exactions of agents do not apply to the colored soldier as well?

Mr. SCOFIELD. No doubt they do. I say we have passed laws for the protection of white soldiers, but not going quite as far as this, because, unlike the blacks, they have not been excluded from your schools by legal prohibition, nor have they all their lives been placed in a dependent position. I know the colored people are ignorant, but it is not their own fault, it is ours. We have passed laws that made it a crime for them to be taught, and now, because they have not the learning that the white man has, gentlemen say we must not pass laws to protect them against plunder by the sharks that hang around the bounty offices. Have you not got enough from the colored man when you have robbed him of his wages all his life? After having induced him to enlist in the Army would you steal his bounty? I do not mean of course the gentleman from Indiana, but I mean those for whom he is unintentionally speaking, whose cause he advocates. Has not the black man suffered enough? Shall we not now give to the Freedmen's Bureau an opportunity to see that the balance of this little bounty shall get into the hand of the soldier himself, so that he shall have the money to spend either in the education of himself or his children?

If I am entitled to the floor I wish to call the previous question; if not, I surrender it to the gentleman from Indiana, with the simple remark that I hope his motion to refer will be voted down and the resolution passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania believes that such a law as this is necessary to protect this class of soldiers from being the victims of plunder and robbery by claim agents, why then the bill ought to pass. But, sir, if the safeguards that we have already adopted with reference to soldiers in general, to all classes, to prevent injustice being done them by claim agents, with the express injunction upon the War Department to use every reasonable degree of precaution to prevent extortion and injustice, if those safeguards are not sufficient to protect the colored soldier, then the only way is to place them under absolute guardianship. For to assume that men who are competent, as the gentleman assumes, to exercise the highest functions of American citizens, are not fit to be intrusted with money earned as soldiers and bounties received from the Government is certainly inconsistent.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I think the white men in my district are as sharp and shrewd as they are anywhere, and yet I get letters from them almost every week complaining that they have been defrauded of their bounty, and asking me to go to the Department to see if I can some way or other protect them. I have no doubt the gentleman himself gets similar letters from the white soldiers who are cheated in his district. Now if, notwithstanding all the protection we give them, these sharp and shrewd white men, who have grown up in the full enjoyment and exercise of the rights of American citizens, have been and are continually defrauded to so great an extent, how much more will these cunning agents take advantage of the colored man, less educated, less trained to business? It is for this reason that I wish to throw around them this additional protection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; and if the laws are not now sufficient to protect our soldiers from injustice and imposition, then they ought to be made sufficient. And I would very gladly and cordially cooperate with the gentleman in the enactment of any law which might be necessary for that purpose, which should be applicable alike to all who have served the country in the late war.

But it comes to this, and the gentleman is driven to the conclusion, that men whom you have recognized by acts of Congress as not only competent to fill the ranks of the Army and Navy—such has been the policy of the Government—and of course entitled to receive the pay and bounty as soldiers, but over and above all that, and infinitely beyond that, as entitled to the great rights of citizenship—these men are to be placed under an absolute guardianship in reference to even the petty compensation to which they are entitled for their labor. Sir, it presents a strange condition of affairs, when vast numbers of men, soldiers in the Army, men who are to be allowed to exercise the highest rights of American citizens, are to be regarded as not fit even to be intrusted with the humblest rights of men in reference to property, not even with the advantage of the ample regulations which have been deemed sufficient to protect the white men of this country from injustice.

That is the main point which I make against this whole measure. Now, whatever may be the result of our action, we should see to it that it is not flagrantly inconsistent. If it is to be the policy of the Government to recognize these colored men as entitled to exercise the highest rights of American citizens, the right of elective franchise and the right to hold office under the Government, inseparably connected with the right of suffrage, we certainly will be acting very inconsistently to deny them the right of managing the simplest transactions of business, or permission to receive and expend the fruits of their industry.

Mr. PILE: Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PILE. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: the gentleman speaks as if this proposed joint resolution was to deny to these colored soldiers a right. Now, I wish to ask him if he speaks as their champion in the protection of their rights; if he is the authorized exponent of their wishes?

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to answer that question right here. I do not assume to be the exponent of any class or section of the American people, except so far as I represent their views and wishes. But I do assume to be the champion, however humble, of right where ever it may appear. I claim to be, in an humble sense, the champion of that equality of legislation which should be applicable alike to all classes of citizens who are placed upon the same footing by your laws. I would not deliberately enact a law applicable to but one class of citizens and at the same time enact another and a different law in reference to citizens occupying the same political grounds, the same high rights of citizenship. In other words, I would not say to a man whom I would invest with the invaluable right of suffrage, the highest right an American citizen can exercise, that he had not the intelligence and the ability necessary to manage the simplest affairs of business. I would not insult the common sense of the country by saying that these colored men are competent to control the destinies of the nation, to elect the highest officers of Government, to determine who shall enact the laws and occupy the Presidential chair, and then by law declare them incompetent to manage the most trivial affairs of ordinary business.

That is the principal ground of my objection to this joint resolution. If, as you assert, the colored man is competent to control the affairs of the nation, I insist that all public laws and regulations which are made applicable to any class of our citizens who participate in controlling public affairs should be made alike applicable to all who are invested with that high right; and that our laws should be sufficiently effective in their provisions to protect all men in their just rights of property. But it comes to this, that the millions of the African race in the South, just emerged from slavery, are competent to control, by their suffrages, the destinies of a great Republic, but incompetent to manage the smallest business transaction or receive the fruits of their labor. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say one thing more, which it seems to me has been left out of the remarks which have been made in regard to this bill.

I perfectly agree with the gentleman that we ought to have general rules operating uniformly upon all classes of cases that are similar; but I call his attention and the attention of the House to the marked difference between the condition of the soldiers and sailors from the States lately in rebellion—the colored soldiers and sailors—and the position of other soldiers and sailors. Our soldiers and sailors, enlisted from northern States, came from States having regular organizations, States that kept account of their military and naval organizations, States that had their military State agents here at Washington to take care of the interests of their soldiers. These soldiers from the South had no such protection or care. Their State authorities were hostile to them. The colored people who enlisted in our Army and Navy enlisted very frequently hundreds of miles away from their homes. They have never since returned to their homes. Indeed, most of them have no homes to which to return.

One of the greatest difficulties existing at present is in finding the persons to whom the prize-money, the back pay, the bounties, &c., due by the Government properly belong. If the persons are ever to get their pay, somebody must look after them. We have now an organization specially charged with the duty of looking after the interests of these freedmen. This Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs knows more than any other organization of the country in regard to the whereabouts of the people to whom the Government owes this money. If we are ever to give these men the money justly due them, if we are ever to identify them, so that the Government may not be defrauded by making payment to the wrong persons, and that the parties to whom the money rightfully belongs may not be defrauded by failing to receive it, I know of no means so well adapted to accomplish this end as to intrust this matter to the hands of the Freedmen's Bureau.

This resolution embraces but three sections. By the first it is provided in substance that all claims for prize money, bounty, back pay, and pensions due to colored soldiers and sailors or their heirs shall be paid over to this Bureau of Freedmen, to be held until they can be paid to the rightful owners. The second section provides rules, regulations, and restrictions for the careful keeping of this money and its payment to those who may present properly authenticated claims. The third section imposes upon the Commissioner of Freedmen's Affairs all the restrictions and obligations imposed upon any other disbursing officer of the Government. The whole measure is merely protective of the rights and interests of the parties concerned. I have examined the bill with some care during this discussion, and it seems to me very carefully drawn. I believe it ought to be passed. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was first upon the motion that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring on ordering the joint resolution to a third reading, it was read the third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

On the passage of the joint resolution there were—ayes 52, noes 16; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rules, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. HOLMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 24.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT ELECTION EXPENSES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) relative to the payment of expenses incurred by the judges of election for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. By the first section the corporations of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, are required to pay, or cause to be paid, all necessary expenses, including printing, clerk hire, room rent, stationery, and a per diem compensation to each of the judges of election in the respective cities appointed under the act of Congress entitled "An act to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved February 5, 1867, of five dollars per day for every day they shall be actually employed in the discharge of their duties, and the certificate of the judges of election of either city, or a majority thereof, of the correctness of any account arising out of the action of the judges shall be deemed sufficient to constitute the same a legal debt against the city to which the judges so certifying shall belong. It is to be lawful for any of the judges of election to administer oaths in all cases relating to the duties assigned them by law, and any person willfully making a false statement under oath before any of them is to be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof to be subject to imprisonment for the term of not less than one nor more than five years.

The second section directs the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia to appoint three commissioners of election in each voting precinct in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, who shall hold their offices for two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, whose duty it shall be to take charge of the ballot-boxes at the polls at each election, to receive and deposit in the boxes the ballots of legalized voters in their respective precincts, to count the votes after the polls are closed, and declare the result, and make returns thereof as now provided by law. The commissioners of election are to receive the votes of all persons whose names are on the list of voters in the precinct, prepared by the judges of election, and none others; they are to have power to administer oaths, and to examine persons offering to vote, and other witnesses as to the identity of voters, and are to receive from their respective cities the same compensation for their services as is now paid to the commissioners of election in said cities. Any person swearing falsely relative to the same is to be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof to be subject to imprisonment for the term of not less than one nor more than five years.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the bill be put on its passage, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN ATLANTIC CABLE TELEGRAPH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate Bill No. 23, to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company of New York the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe, via the Bermudas and Azores islands; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the bill be put on its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us hear the bill.

The bill was read at length. The first section vests the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company, of New York, with the right, power, and privilege, having acquired the necessary land therefor, to lay, land, and operate their cable or cables on the Atlantic coast, except the coast of Florida, within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the right, power, and privilege so to lay, land, and operate their cable or cables shall be vested in the said American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company for the period of twenty years from the approval of this act; provided the company shall commence active operations within the space of two years from the approval of this act.

The second section provides that the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company, having acquired the necessary land therefor, shall have the right, power, and privilege to lay, land, and operate their cable or cables within any of the harbors, water, inlets, towns, and cities on the Atlantic coast, except the coast of Florida, offering the most practical and convenient landing, and to construct or erect all the necessary fixtures to accomplish the object of this act.

The third section provides that the Government of the United States shall at all times have the preference in its use, upon terms that may be agreed upon between the Postmaster General and the company.

The fourth section provides that Congress shall have power to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no limitation of the charges for transmission over the wires for the Government.

Mr. CHANLER. This is only an extension of the power under the law passed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, as I understand it. If so, that law contains all the limitations necessary in reference to the point made by the gentleman from Indiana. I recollect that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] debated them at the time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. This is not the charter itself. The charter is contained in another bill. That contains all the minutiae.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would not the effect of the last section be to repeal the limitations heretofore made?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would, it seems to me, if this is supplementary to the other containing the limitations.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is a State charter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then it does not refer to the same act to which the gentleman from New York alludes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I am not sure the one I refer to is the one he refers to. The charter under which they operate is a State charter.

Mr. SCOFIELD. What State?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. New York.

Mr. CHANLER. I was under the apprehension this was to extend the line from Florida.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. That was passed at the last session. This is not the same bill. Some gentlemen may think it is a chimerical scheme. It is a rival scheme to the line now between Europe and the United States. It grants no subsidy, and will probably cost the company four or five million dollars. It does not refer to the bill referred to by the gentleman from New York, I know, for I took some interest in that.

Mr. CHANLER. My idea was that it was a continuation of the same scheme.

Mr. BROOKS. It seems to me there is some careless phraseology in the bill, as I judge from hearing it read. In the first place let me ask the gentleman from Illinois why the coast of Florida has been reserved? And before he answers the question let me say it is reserved because we have already chartered a line to run, I think, from New York via Florida to Cuba. But as I understand the phraseology of this bill, it prohibits the use of the coast of Florida to any other line. Now, as Florida is a peninsula, stretching far out into the Gulf of Mexico, it is rather a broad use of words to except that whole coast without naming a reason why it is excepted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will say to the gentleman that I think he gives to the language of the bill a very wide construction, I imagine, when he says it would prohibit any other corporation from using any part of the coast of Florida. It only prohibits this company, as I understand it, from leaving the coast of Florida for the reason named by himself.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that it reserves the harbors and rivers of that coast for a number of years.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I may be mistaken, but my impression was that it granted the coast of Florida to another company, and that this bill was intended to guard the interest of that company. I call for the reading of that portion of the bill.

The Clerk read the provision by which the telegraph company are authorized to lay their cable on the Atlantic coast, except the coast of Florida, and granting them privileges within any harbors or inlets except on the coast of Florida.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire to say that I recollect very well the passage of the bill which granted the use of the coast of Florida to another company; and there were objections then raised on the ground that it was a monopoly. But there can be no monopoly in this case; it establishes competition. Therefore what was urged against that bill cannot be urged against this.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say a word or two on this subject. Without pretending to any familiarity with the details of the provisions of this bill, I am very glad to see a bill of this kind before the House. I should be glad to know that there were about to be constructed half a dozen ocean telegraph lines, if it were possible, and I will indicate my reasons by quoting a part of the language of Lord Derby at the last Lord Mayor's dinner, on the 9th of November, when he said, among other things:

"Peace has its triumphs as well as war; and in the course of the past year we can point with pride to a triumph more advantageous to the human race, redounding more to the credit of the country than any which could be acquired by any warlike operations, however skillfully carried on. I allude to that great triumph which has been achieved by British science, by British perseverance, by British energy, by which we have maintained our claim to exercise dominion over the sea, and combined in intimate and enduring bonds the great continents of Europe and America, between which we have succeeded in annihilating time and space."

The absurdity of that claim on the part of Great Britain I think all the world will soon recognize. But as the luster of the meteor flag of England has been dimmed by the splendor of our stars, I wish we could have half a dozen cables, so that they should feel that while they have one connecting the British Provinces on the north, we are independent of them in our relations with all other trans-Atlantic countries.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEYS OF RIVERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 28, in relation to the execution of surveys of rivers ordered by Congress; which was read a first and second time.

It provides that the chief of Engineers may, with the approval of the Secretary of War, employ such civil engineers, not exceeding five in number, for the purpose of executing surveys and improvements of western and north-western rivers, ordered by Congress, as may be necessary to the proper and diligent prosecution of the same; and the persons so employed may be allowed a reasonable compensation for their services, not to exceed the sum of $3,000 per annum.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I do not suppose it is necessary for me to say anything upon this joint resolution. The object of it is to enable the Secretary of War to employ some extra engineers. There is more business now than the force of engineers can perform. I ask the Clerk to read a letter which I send up to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, March 23, 1867.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 22d instant, inclosing a resolution referred to the Committee on Commerce, having for its object the employment of civil engineers by the War Department, and asking information on the subject, I have the honor to state that I approve of such provision by Congress, with the limitation as to number and compensation specified in the resolution.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. Z. CHANDLER, Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

Mr. COOK. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope there will be no objection to this joint resolution.

Mr. COOK. I call the previous question upon the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken upon the passage of the joint resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes 51, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. Cook were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes sixty-seven, noes not counted.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 99) for the relief of Richard Busted, jr.;

An act (S. No. 100) supplementary to an act for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral of the United States Navy;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 41) for the purchase of lands adjoining the navy-yard at Brooklyn;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) in reference to the payment of salaries of members of Congress;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval, and commercial purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes;" and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 50) to furnish transportation of provisions to the destitute in the South.

IMPEACHMENT—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas upon charges preferred in the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Ninth Congress against the President of the United States of high crimes and misdemeanors, alleged to have been committed by him in the execution of his official trust, the Committee on the Judiciary of the said House, to which the same was referred, did report that for want of sufficient time they were unable to conclude their investigation, but that upon the facts disclosed it was in their judgment required and demanded that the inquiry should be prosecuted to a conclusion by the present Congress; and whereas in accordance with the said opinion this House did commit the said subject anew to its Committee on the Judiciary, which is now diligently engaged in the examination thereof; and whereas, in view of the report and recommendation of the Judiciary Committee of the last House, it would be dangerous to the public interest and a failure of duty on the part of the present Congress to adjourn and abdicate its practical control over the administration of the Government by surrendering its destinies, in the present critical condition of affairs, into the hands of an officer thus impeached before the nation, and well known not only to be hostile to the policy of its Congress, and to entertain the opinion that all the acts of that Congress looking to a restoration of the Union unconstitutional; Therefore,
Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein.) That the Speakers of the two Houses be directed to adjourn the same on Saturday, the 30th day of March, instant, at three o'clock p. m., to meet on the first Monday of June at twelve o'clock meridian, for the purpose of receiving the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives on the charges preferred against the President, as aforesaid, and taking such order thereon, as well as on other matters which may be submitted to them, as the interests and exigencies of the Government may demand.

Mr. CHANLER. Is this a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I desire to call the previous question on this preamble and resolution; but before doing so I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, without expressing any opinion in relation to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Kansas, or intimating what my vote will be upon it, I prefer that no action should be had until after the report of the conference committee (which is now out) upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I deem it necessary, however, inasmuch as the question of impeachment is referred to in the resolution, to say a few words respecting the action of the Judiciary Committee on that subject.

During the Thirty-Ninth Congress the President of the United States was impeached by the gentleman from Ohio, and the resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee, embracing five distinct propositions. The first charged the President with being guilty of corruptly using the veto power; the second with corruptly using the appointing power; the third with corruptly using the pardoning power. These several powers are vested in the President by the Constitution of the United States. No one can deny that he has the right to exercise these powers; the question is whether he has corruptly used them. Now, it will be seen that those three questions, having been submitted to the Judiciary Committee, the examination of them involved an extended investigation, requiring the examination of witnesses from various portions of the country, and necessarily demanded the occupation of much time.

In addition to that, the committee have been called upon to inquire into the question whether the President has corruptly disposed of the property of the United States; whether he has corruptly interfered with elections in the United States; and then, in addition, the general question, whether he has so corruptly conducted himself generally as to render himself impeachable under the clause of the Constitution authorizing impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors.

The propositions which were submitted to the Judiciary Committee were broad in their character; and I apprehend from what was said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] the other day that an erroneous impression has gone forth to the country in relation to the action of the committee upon the subject; for I understood the gentleman to say that the investigation has now come to be considered by the country as a "farce." I do not believe that the country knows what has transpired before the Judiciary Committee, and certainly I do not propose to give them that information. I can only say, in justification of the committee, that they have assiduously attended to the investigation from the time when the question was referred to them to the present moment; that day by day, and almost every day without intermission, they have devoted themselves to the subject. They desire that the question shall be settled one way or the other, for they, with other members of the House, believe that the country has been sufficiently agitated by this grave question, and that by reason of such agitation there is not that stability in the business of the country which ought to exist, and that until the question is settled instability will continue to prevail. Gentlemen of capital do not know whether or how to make investments, and the country ought to be quieted by having the matter decided one way or the other.

At the close of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the committee reported that they had come to no conclusion, but that, under the circumstances they deemed it proper and necessary that the investigation should be continued by the Fortieth Congress—expressing no opinion, but merely saying to the House and the country that they had not up to that time been able to perform the duties which the House had imposed upon them, but had arrived at such a stage that they deemed it proper that further investigation should be had. The House adopted the report, and since the commencement of the Fortieth Congress the committee have further devoted themselves to the investigation; and I may say (because it is not improper that I should do so) that the committee have now, by an arrangement, agreed that after separating at the close of the present session they will meet again about the 1st of May to continue their labors.

It is to be hoped, sir, by every American citizen that there will appear nothing to render necessary or justify the impeachment of the President; but if a state of facts should appear rendering it proper to impeach that officer, the Committee on the Judiciary will not shrink from their responsibility, but will recommend to the House articles of impeachment and the trial of the officer before the Senate of the United States. It is a duty that we did not seek, a duty from which we should be very glad to be relieved; nevertheless it is our duty; and in my judgment every member of the committee will candidly, fairly, and without prejudice examine this question, and report to the House the convictions of their deliberate judgment.

Sir, I make these remarks because, from the statement made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] not now in his seat, erroneous inferences respecting the committee and their action in the premises might be drawn.

It is not my province, nor have I the right, to divulge anything before the committee; and I do not intend to do so. I merely mean to say that it is the intention of the committee to pursue the investigation fairly and assiduously, and to report to the House and the country the convictions of their judgment on the testimony brought before them.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but for a few moments. When shall we cease this frivolous and absurd agitation? When will the majority here consent to give the country a little rest? When will the people of the United States be allowed to follow their honest pursuits without continual interference with those pursuits by this persistent and absurd agitation of the impeachment of the President of the United States?

Almost every day from the commencement of this session some member on that side of the House under some pretext, upon some question or the other, has presented this subject. What is the object? What does it mean? If there is to be impeachment, present the articles, take a vote, go on and do it now, sir, when the Senate is in session, and when it can proceed with the trial at once.

Mr. LOAN. I will ask the gentleman a question, and that is whether the members on his side of the House, acting in concert with him, will sustain the radical Union men on this side in forcing a vote before the adjournment of the present session of Congress on this subject?

Mr. WOOD. I can only answer for myself, individually. I have already said on this floor that I would go for the impeachment of the President or any other official on proper charges properly substantiated.

Mr. LOAN. The gentleman will pardon me, but he has not answered my question.

Mr. WOOD. I have; I can only speak for myself. What other gentlemen on this side of the House will do I cannot answer. I can only say what I will do.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is not a shadow of foundation upon which to base the slightest pretext for this proceeding. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, virtually admitted that down to this time there is no foundation upon which they can predicate impeachment. There is more than this House or the people of this country knows in this continued agitation.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman must have misapprehended me. I made no such statement; I made no such concession. I did not design to throw out any intimation, one way or the other, as to my own private opinion or the opinion of any on the committee, or of any person respecting the guilt or innocence of the President of the United States.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Vermont, in the remarks he submitted to the House, did say when the committee had proper evidence they would report impeachment resolutions. That was a virtual admission that up to this time, after elaborate investigation, they have been unable to obtain anything whatsoever upon which to base such action. The report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Thirty-Ninth Congress virtually admitted, and indeed declared in terms, there was no evidence upon which to predicate such a proceeding.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman still misapprehends me. I do not wish it to go out to the country that, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I have prejudged this case, or made any remarks which would authorize the gentleman in drawing the conclusion he has drawn. I said that at the close of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the Judiciary Committee submitted a report to the House, which was accepted. It was to the effect that they had been unable to complete their investigation, but that sufficient had come before them to induce them to recommend to the Fortieth Congress to proceed with the investigation. I believe that report was signed by every member of the committee, save the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.] I think the language was that it was not only proper, but there was a demand for further investigation; and that since the organization of the Fortieth Congress the committee had been earnestly engaged in pursuing the investigation, without prejudice or partisanship, and in due time would report the result of their examination to the House.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think the fact that this committee have been now for nearly a year in a continual investigation of this matter, in which they have subpoenaed witnesses from every part of the United States, and have entered into a very close scrutiny of every particle of evidence that can be distorted into an implication of the President, and have reached the "lame and impotent conclusion" made to the last Congress, are sufficient to convince this country that there is in existence no evidence upon which the President of the United States can be impeached.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him in one particular? He says the Judiciary Committee have been pursuing this investigation for about a year. They have been pursuing it for less than three months. It was not referred to them till January. I am not surprised that the gentleman does not understand the subject when he ventures such assertions as that they have been investigating the matter for a year.

Mr. WOOD. It is immaterial as to the number of months. I assume that if there is any evidence, that in three months they would be able to produce it, and the fact that they have not been able to do so is the very best reply that none exists.

Now, what is the condition of things presented here to-day? A motion is made that this House shall fix a time for the purpose of receiving articles of impeachment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] made a speech of an hour the other day, in which he argued in favor of a perpetual session of Congress, because first, the President might do something wrong; second, the Supreme Court might do something wrong; and third, the political condition of Maryland is obnoxious to a majority of Congress. I suppose if we wait a few days and hear from Connecticut the gentleman might find another reason in the anti-republican character of the constitution of that State.

Now, what a spectacle is exhibited. With all the material interests of the country paralyzed, the people groaning under onerous taxation, the business of the country going to destruction for want of proper legislation, the Congress of the United States is frittering away its time in a fruitless effort to find some fault with some State or some individual that may happen to be obnoxious to the majority here. Sir, I repeat it is absurd, and the absurdity of the proposition is only equaled by that of the arguments with which it is sustained.

Now, sir, let us hear no more of this. If the President is to be impeached, produce your articles. If he is not to be impeached, either proceed to legislation, or if you are not prepared to legislate, adjourn your Congress and give the country quiet and rest.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER. Allow me to say that I had no knowledge of this resolution until it was read to the House. I have examined it, and I desire to say a few words in its behalf. In reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood,] who says this is an absurd and unjust agitation of the question of impeachment, having had something to do with that agitation, I suppose I may without offense state some of the grounds upon which I have acted.

In the first place, as to what has been done by the committee. No man has a right to know what they know. It is enough that they have said solemnly that there is sufficient ground to continue the investigation, and that they have not completed it. That being so, no man has a right to say that they have found nothing. They have found something by which they feel themselves called upon to continue their search into the acts of the President.

The absurdity of this agitation, as it is called, may be seen in the fact that the Legislatures of two States have by solemn vote called upon Congress to investigate for the impeachment of the President. The necessity of the proceeding is sustained by the fact that petition after petition has been submitted under the rule and referred to that committee. It is seen in the fact that the country has no longer any confidence in the Executive. In my judgment the Constitution meant to provide that when the country, by an almost universal voice, expresses its loss of confidence in the Executive, the time has then come for Congress to declare that the occupant of the presidential chair, which he no longer fills, but obstructs, should be removed.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] says that such a precedent will put the Executive at the mercy of Congress. Well, who compose the Congress? Congress are the representatives of the people, fresh from them, speaking their will, echoing their thoughts, and enacting their high behests. It is for them to bring to the Senate, representing the organization of States, the charges against the high officer who has so offended against the peoples' will under the Constitution. And it is for that Senate, on their solemn oaths, to judge upon the state of facts thus presented. I hold and shall—I may say that the country holds—that every officer ought to continue in office upon that tenure alone, except possibly judges, who are the only exceptions, that they are removable by the representatives of the people upon such misbehavior in office as the people shall deem sufficient.

Now, with the full sense of all the responsibilities that are upon me, knowing that I speak in the face of the nation, I can inform the gentleman from New York of one piece of testimony that can be brought on oath before the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not say it has yet been brought before them; but I say there is a piece of testimony that can be produced showing a gross abuse of the pardoning power by the President. A claim agent in West Virginia last year conceived the idea of having a large number of deserters from the Army of the United States pardoned, in order that he might obtain large gains from pressing their claims for their forfeited bounties and pay before the War Department. He took from the returns of the adjutant general of that State a list of one hundred and ninety-three deserters, forty only of whom he knew anything about; all the rest were unknown to him, except that they stood upon the rolls marked "deserters." He went to the Democratic candidate in one of the congressional districts of West Virginia—

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman, while he is so ready to produce evidence to show an abuse of the pardoning power, which he deems a sufficient cause for impeachment, why does he not add to that an exposé of the lost leaves of Booth's diary?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not fully hear the question of the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD. I ask the gentleman why he does not submit to the country, and especially to the Committee on the Judiciary, the very important testimony which was lost when the leaves were torn out of Booth's diary? I think from the intimations of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] in reference to that subject, some one, whether in his party or not I will not say, whether in this House or at the other end of the avenue I will not say, has been guilty of an outrage of much greater magnitude than an abuse of the pardoning power.

Mr. BUTLER. I will endeavor to answer the gentleman if I have time. Let me finish the statement I was making.

This claim agent in West Virginia called upon the Democratic candidate to state that if he could get these one hundred and ninety-three men pardoned they would vote the Democratic ticket in the last election, and as the district was likely to be close their votes would probably elect him. Thereupon the candidate wrote a letter to the President of the United States, which letter was sent to him.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The point of order which I wish to state is this: the gentleman now occupying the Speaker's chair [Mr. Boutwell] is aware of the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] has been permitted to come before the Committee on the Judiciary and examine a witness. The Chair is also aware that the injunction of secrecy has been imposed upon that committee. Now, I insist that, having been admitted before them by the courtesy of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] has no right to comment upon the facts he is now giving to the House; he has no right to disclose any fact or statement which occurred before that committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot sustain the point of order raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Eldridge,] because the House has taken no action in that respect upon the proceedings before the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I am careful not to state anything as having taken place before the Committee on the Judiciary. What I am now stating I know outside of the committee. But if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldridge] chooses to tell the House that any such testimony as I am stating has been taken by the Committee on the Judiciary, it is he and not I who is making the revelation of what was done in committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I insist that I have not disclosed anything that occurred before the committee; but I have raised the question of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts, having been before the committee, and having had the privilege of examining witnesses [Mr. Butler. A witness] has no right to state the facts which appeared before the committee. Does the gentleman allege that these facts which he is stating did not come to his knowledge before the committee?

Mr. BUTLER. I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that these facts came to my knowledge before I was ever in the room of the Judiciary Committee, or else perhaps he never would have known anything about them till he hears the statement to the House the present time. He is the man who discloses what has been done in the Judiciary Committee when he says that I was before it. I have not said any word of what was done before the committee. The gentleman must keep the secrets of his own committee; I will not disclose them.

Now, I say again that that letter was sent to the President of the United States, saying that the district was close, and that if these men were pardoned they would vote the Democratic ticket and thus carry the district. With it was sent a copy of the list of deserters to the President of the United States, and thereupon every one of these one hundred and ninety-three men was restored to the roll and thus entitled to claim his pay and allowances, which they had forfeited by desertion; and the pay and allowances, in the judgment of those who have investigated the subject, exceed the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars.

Now, sir, I will explain to the House how I came to know anything about this matter; for, sir, I am no volunteer. The House did not seem to desire me to take any part in developing the evidence bearing on this impeachment, and I have let the House and its committee take care of itself in that regard. But, sir, I happen to be a member of the board of managers of the National Asylum for Disabled Soldiers; by the choice of my fellow-managers I am president of that board. The fund which Congress has appropriated to the support of our disabled soldiers in that institution consists of the fines and forfeitures suffered by deserters; and when I was looking after that fund, as was my duty to do, I found that without evidence to sustain him, without examination, the President of the United States, for political reasons, had taken $75,000 of that fund which the managers of this institution, of which he was one ex officio, were to administer for the benefit of the disabled heroes of the war, and had turned it over to the deserters from the Army, on the understanding only that they should vote the Democratic ticket. Learning this fact, sir, I felt bound to pursue this investigation; and the testimony which I have now in substance given to the House has been given upon the oath of a brevet brigadier general of the Army of the United States.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts be kind enough to tell the House to which district of West Virginia his remarks has reference?

Mr. BUTLER. The district represented by Mr. KITCHEN. Oh, sir, I have no concealment.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I only want to get at the facts for the benefit of history, and more particularly of West Virginia. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. All right, sir; the gentleman shall have them all. He is welcome to anything that I can do in this regard for the benefit of West Virginia or any other place.

Now, sir, let me state one fact further, because I have nothing to conceal about this matter—I am speaking upon sworn testimony; if it is not true, let it be investigated. I never brought out any of these facts bearing on impeachment except when I have been much enforced—

"Like the flint which shows a hasty spark,
And straight is cold again."

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether, according to this testimony or within his own knowledge, the President had personal cognizance of these facts?

Mr. BUTLER. I will state what the testimony is. That list of one hundred and ninety-three deserters, with no other testimony but this letter, went to the President through the hands of Colonel Thomas B. Florence, who is somewhat known to members of the House; and the answer that came back was a restoration of every one of the men on that list, without dotting an i, or crossing a t, so far as can be seen, and upon no other testimony than the fact that they would vote the Democratic ticket; which I suppose would be a good reason for restoring all the deserters from the Army, thereby entirely absorbing the fund set aside for disabled soldiers.

Mr. WOOD. I submit that the reply of the gentleman from Massachusetts virtually acquits the President from any complicity in this transaction.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to finish this statement to the House. My statement does not acquit the President, because he has no right to restore to deserters hundreds and thousands of dollars out of the Treasury without some evidence of some deserving other than that they will vote for the Democratic ticket; and he had no other evidence in this case. There is where the trouble comes in. He received a letter from the candidate for Congress, accompanied by a list of deserters, and without evidence, without inquiry, without anybody's recommendation, without any deserving on their part, he does that act which restores them, takes from the Treasury $75,000, takes it from the poor maimed soldier, and gives it to these deserters.

I introduced the name of Colonel Florence because it was introduced in the testimony; and I never do anything behind any gentleman's back. The same testimony also shows when Mr. Florence brought back this list, which was sent to the claim agent in the charge of and directed to the care of Hon. Thomas B. Florence, that he was paid by this claim agent $1,000 for his service in that behalf. Is there any other question any gentleman would like to ask me? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman if that is the rate at which Democratic voters were procured in his experience when he was a Democrat?

Mr. BUTLER. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." I was never a Democrat in the gentleman's State. I never knew of any such transaction in my own.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman to answer, because he seemed to make the assertion as if this were a Democratic question. I do not myself wish to be understood as in any way believing this has anything to do with the Democratic party. It is a transaction in a single district that has nothing at all to do with the Democratic party.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not charge the Democratic party with it. I never take notice of very small things, and I think the Democratic party is too small at present. [laughter.] I always like to take a man of my size, when I am going to strike. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman if he thinks when he left the Democratic party he reduced it to its present size?

Mr. BUTLER. The country will judge what reduced it.

Mr. CHANLER. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot continue the colloquy with the gentleman, as it is not pertinent to the issue.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask the gentleman from Kansas to yield to me a few moments.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman for a short time.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts correctly. He speaks of facts which have been proven. To what evidence does he refer?

Mr. BUTLER. An investigation, sir, which I instituted for the purpose of seeing where the money of the asylum over which I presided was going, and which I took care should be put in the proper channels.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to say merely a word in regard to this, as I have but a moment accorded to me. The investigation before the proper committee of this House it is not proper to speak of; but, sir, I think if all the facts were here it could be shown that the statements of the gentlemen from Massachusetts are unauthorized and are brought before the House this morning in an improper manner, and one which I venture to predict may turn out in the future not to be creditable to the gentleman who has thus dragged them at this time before the House.

This whole very grave and important question has been referred by the House to the appropriate committee. If the House will permit gentlemen of any party to come here from day to day and bring before the House and spread before the country their own ex parte statements of what they may claim to be evidence, the country may be kept in a ferment continually, great injury done to its material business interests, and gross injustice to the high officers whose conduct is subjected to rigid scrutiny. I insist that this mode of making ex parte statements and endeavoring to force the country to prejudge a matter undergoing the serious investigation of a committee of this House by its direction, is unwarranted and unjust, and ought not to be tolerated by the House. It ought, in my judgment, to receive its severest condemnation.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me a single word?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. My justification is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] said this whole agitation was absurd and was not based on the slightest evidence. I was driven in self-defense to say what I did. I had not said a word either about Booth's diary or about this matter until somebody wanted to know. Then I always answer.

Mr. MARSHALL. I am not aware that the matter of Booth's diary has been up this morning.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes; it was referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. MARSHALL. The gentleman from Massachusetts, if I am not greatly mistaken, voluntarily brought before the House, in the first place, a matter of fact which he said could be proven, and upon that statement of pretended facts he makes a bitter attack upon the Chief Magistrate of our country. Now, without controverting the statement of the gentleman, or undertaking to say that I know anything about it, for I cannot allude to testimony taken before the committee of which I am a member, I repeat that when all the evidence is taken and published I trust that it will appear that there is no good ground for the attack made at this time upon the President by the gentleman from Massachusetts. This dragging before the House from day to day isolated statements of facts and evidence, whether fictitious or real, in regard to the conduct of the Chief Magistrate and other high public officers of the Government, is not only unjust and improper, but it should receive the severest condemnation of the House and of the country, and I believe all just-minded men will take this view of it throughout the length and breadth of this land.

But I will not trespass further upon the House, as I have the floor but for a moment merely by the courtesy of the gentleman from Kansas. I protest against this unjust and irregular method of proceeding against the highest officer of the Government, especially at this time when the whole subject is undergoing a grave judicial investigation before a committee of gentlemen, who I am satisfied will attempt to do justice, and do it in the proper manner and at the proper time.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have offered this resolution not so much for the purpose of expressing my own views upon the question, as for the purpose of bringing the subject directly before the House and securing action upon it. On the 7th of January, 1867, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] presented a resolution to this House, with a preamble, as follows:

"I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice President and acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors."

"I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law; in that he has corruptly used the appointing power; in that he has corruptly used the pardoning power; in that he has corruptly used the veto power; in that he has corruptly disposed of the public property of the United States; in that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts, and conspired with others to commit acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors."

On the 7th of January last the foregoing grave and solemn charges went forth to the country. The time proposed in this resolution for the adjournment of Congress is on the first Monday in June, which will make an interval of five months during which the Judiciary Committee of the Thirty-Ninth and of the Fortieth Congress will have had to prosecute their investigation. Now, sir, I ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] if charges of this character were preferred against him as a member of the House of Representatives, how long he would be content to sit in this body and delay a report of the committee charged with the investigation. I do not believe he would be willing to sit here two months or one month or even a single week.

I agree most fully with the gentleman from New York that if this means impeachment, why not act upon it at once. It is due to ourselves, it is due to the nation, it is due to the loyal people who, during the four years of war, sustained the flag of the Republic that we should go forward and act upon a question so seriously affecting the honor and welfare of this great nation. I agree with him that the question having been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary on the 7th of January for investigation, and that investigation having been prosecuted in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and having been again by the action of the Fortieth Congress referred to the Judiciary Committee, it is due to ourselves, and most certainly due to the Chief Magistrate of this nation, that there should be action by that committee before the regular meeting in December.

It is for this purpose I have offered this resolution. The preamble contains no declaration that has not been made again and again both during the Thirty-Ninth Congress and the present session of the Fortieth Congress. There is no declaration, then, that has not been repeatedly affirmed by a majority of this House in reference to the acts of the President of the United States.

Now, one other remark. It was stated the other day by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] that throughout the length and breadth of this land there could not be found more than twenty-five newspapers all told that were outspoken in favor of the impeachment of the President. Sir, in the district which I represent on this floor there are forty-one newspapers published in the English and the German languages. And of those forty-one papers I do not know of half a dozen which have not directly and frankly expressed the opinion that the President ought to be impeached and removed from office if found guilty. And during a late visit to my own State, while the Legislature of the State was in session, I became satisfied that had the question been brought fairly before them there would not have been, I believe, a dozen out of a hundred members who would have expressed an opinion in favor of the President.

I say again, it is due to the Chief Magistrate of this nation, it is due to the nation itself, if the President is guilty of the grave charges preferred against him by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] as long ago as the 7th of January last, that the prosecution should be carried to some final result. If he is innocent, then most certainly gentlemen upon the other side of this House, gentlemen upon all sides of the House, will agree with me that the investigation ought to be so carried out as to show that fact.

I have therefore offered this resolution for the purpose of bringing the question before the House, believing that gentlemen upon all sides of the House ought to concur at least in the propriety of prosecuting this most important matter, relating so materially and directly to the welfare and honor of the nation, to a conclusion, whether it shall result in the conviction or acquittal of the President. I now call the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for two or three minutes? I see he has some of his hour yet left.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I cannot yield further.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I desire to move to lay this preamble and resolution upon the table. And I will state as my reason for that motion that I understand the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the adjournment resolution are now ready to report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No debate is in order.

The question was taken upon laying the preamble and resolution upon the table, and upon a division there were—ayes 45, noes 43.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 56, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baldwin, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Cornell, Denison, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Mercour, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Peters, Phelps, Pile, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, Twitchell, Van Aukon, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodbridge—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benton, Bontwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Judd, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Miller, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Plants, Polsley, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Churchill, Cobb, Cullom, Daves, Dodge, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Haight, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hunter, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Newcomb, Neell, Orth, Paine, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stone, Taffe, Taylor, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—66.

So the preamble and resolution were not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SHANKS said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. JULIAN, is absent by leave of the House on account of sickness in his family.

The question recurring upon seconding the call for the previous question; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 24, noes 70.

So the call for the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "that" where it first occurs and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

The President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby instructed to adjourn their respective Houses at 3 o'clock p. m. on the 30th day of March, instant, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867, at noon, when the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause the roll of each House respectively to be called; and if there be no quorum present the said Houses shall adjourn from day to day for four successive days, and on each day the roll of the respective Houses shall be called; and if at every such calling there shall be found to be no quorum present in either the Senate or House of Representatives, the said President and Speaker shall thereupon adjourn their respective Houses without day.

Mr. Speaker, I call the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] to permit me to move to amend his resolution so as to conform to the resolution which we passed yesterday, by striking out "either the Senate or House of Representatives" and inserting "both Houses."

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot yield for such an amendment. It would spoil the sense, or have an effect different from that which I desire.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the original resolution.

The resolution was read.

Mr. BROOMALL. I withdraw the call for the previous question, for the purpose of saying that I am in favor of the original resolution, and have voted for the proposition which it contains in every shape in which it has been presented up to the present time. The fact, however, that the previous question has not been sustained indicates that at this time we are not going to pass that resolution. It is important that some resolution upon the subject of adjournment should be agreed upon. Should the substitute which I offer be adopted, the gentleman from Kansas can at any time renew his resolution, and we can have as much discussion upon it as we choose.

I was in favor of having a session on the first Monday of every month during the recess; and on each occasion when the question has been presented I have voted for the greatest number of sessions. But from the action of the Senate on various occasions, and from the disagreement of the committee of conference, about to be reported, I am satisfied that nothing more than this proposition can obtain the concurrence of the Senate. It avoids the difficulty urged by the gentleman from Ohio, because it does not put it in the power of a minority of either House to thwart the will of a majority of one House and the whole of the other; but it does leave it in the power of either House to prevent there being a session of Congress. I see no way to prevent that; and I am satisfied that a proposition of this sort is the most to which we can get the assent of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to have some agreement about adjournment to-day, and I desire a speedy vote on this proposition. I yield, however, to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, yesterday this House by a very large vote passed a resolution (which was sent to the Senate, but upon which, so far as we are advised, that body has not yet acted) providing for an adjournment of this Congress at three o'clock to-day until a designated day in June, on which day, if upon a call of the roll there should not be a quorum of both Houses in attendance, an adjournment should take place until a certain day in September, when again the roll should be called, and if there should not be a quorum present in both Houses, Congress should stand adjourned until the first Monday of December.

Now, sir, in this resolution the gentleman has omitted the word "both" and inserted the word "either"; the effect of which will be that if upon the roll-calls on the four consecutive days there should be found a bare quorum in one House, while in the other there should be no quorum, we could do no business and we could get no adjournment. Why, sir, this House cannot compel the Senate to enforce the attendance of a quorum any more than the Senate can compel this House to enforce the attendance of a quorum; and without a quorum in both Houses there could be no adjournment. I do not propose to sit here as a one-horse machine from next June until next December. I think the world has had lesson enough on the subject of a single representative assembly. I think France gave us a lesson during the four years of her single assembly from 1791 to 1794, a lesson she will never forget herself, and I undertake to say will never again repeat. I propose to stand by the principle of the resolution of yesterday, and allow the two Houses, if a quorum appear in each, to continue their session, whether we adjourn to June or July, until they finish what to them seems fit and good and right. I ask the gentleman to allow me to move to strike out "either" and insert for it the word "both." If he will do that I will go for his resolution. If he will not allow me to do that I will vote against it. I do not propose to initiate a proceeding of this sort, which in my judgment can but be disastrous to the great cause we represent, when the spectacle will be presented of a minority in one House and a quorum in the other struggling from day to day, and from week to week, unable to adjourn, until one House or the other certifies the fact to the President and you are prorogued under the Constitution.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will detain the House but a moment. The gentleman from Ohio has entirely mistaken the purport of the resolution. The resolution is this: if on such call there shall be found to be no quorum present in either the Senate or the House of Representatives, then there shall be a final adjournment; that is to say, if there is a quorum in the House and none in the Senate there shall be a final adjournment.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir.

Mr. BROOMALL. If there be a quorum in the Senate and none in the House then there shall be an adjournment. That is the language and meaning of the resolution; and the gentleman from Ohio has not read it or he would have come to the same conclusion precisely that I do.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman's attention one moment. Does he not know by reading his resolution if there be a quorum in the House alone they will not be adjourned? I beg him to answer that?

Mr. BROOMALL. I know to the contrary?

Mr. BINGHAM. If you know to the contrary then go on.

Mr. BROOMALL. If there be no quorum in either one or the other there shall be an adjournment. Now, can language be plainer than that? It means what he desires it shall mean, and nothing else.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to know, sir, how we are to ever get disentangled if we go on passing these resolutions in reference to the adjournment. How many resolutions have we already passed? Certainly we have passed one from which we have as yet no report from the Senate.

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, instead of voting on any more of these resolutions to adjourn, we had better take a vote on the resolution of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE.] That resolution means something, and all these other resolutions do not.

For the last three or four months I have been satisfied that the committee are making but a mere pretense of prosecuting the impeachment by way of throwing it out of doors. I do not believe they ever intended it, and I do not believe they intend it now. I should like therefore to have a direct vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas, to know how we stand. Holding these views and believing that what we are now doing is only intended and calculated to delude the people and make them believe just what is desired, although we know the result will be contrary to their expectations, I very much prefer that we should have a direct vote on this question involved in the resolution of the gentleman from Kansas, so the country may know exactly where we stand. I hope my friend will withdraw his amendment and let us have a direct vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas. If that is voted down, the gentleman can again move his proposition as a privileged question. It is hardly germane to the question now before the House; it does not belong there; it is unfair to make it.

Mr. BROOMALL. I yield now three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to second what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] It is time we should stop this feverish excitement which has extended all over the country upon this question; and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] will assent to the request of his colleague to allow a direct vote to be taken on the original resolution. If it is the wish of the House that the Judiciary Committee shall go on inquiring into the matter of impeachment until it is thoroughly investigated, let us say so by a direct vote. On the contrary, if the majority of the members of the House are of the opinion that there is no ground for impeachment, let them say so. This beating about the bush; this playing at the game of—I do not know what you call it—"now you see it, and now you don't see it;" this adjourning till June, with no intention of meeting then, but by resolution putting it beyond the power of Congress to meet at that time; this putting it in the power of a minority to prevent any business being done in June, even if we do meet, is all wrong and nonsensical.

I do not propose to express an opinion now as to whether the President is guilty and ought to be impeached or not, while we have the Judiciary Committee investigating that subject. I am willing to withhold my judgment until I can have their report and evidence before me. But since that Committee has already reported that sufficient evidence has been introduced before them to render it imperative that the investigation should be prosecuted still further, and this House by solemn resolution has referred the evidence again to the committee with instruction to pursue the investigation, is it not ridiculous and absurd for us to be playing this game of adjourning till next December, thus indirectly circumventing the Committee and putting it beyond their power to do what we have directed them to do?

It is a very simple question. It is to come square up to the mark and vote ay or no upon allowing the committee to make the investigation and reporting upon it, declaring that we wish them to report or that we will abandon the whole question of impeachment. I ask, in the name of common sense and in the name of the people of this country whose minds are unsettled, that the House of Representatives shall, with that dignity which becomes action upon so grave and solemn a question, decide either to go on with the impeachment or abandon it and let the country rest. I think we subject ourselves to the criticism which is made upon our acts by the gentlemen on the other side of the House. Many of their criticisms are just, and for my part I shall feel ashamed to go home and face my constituents after voting that this committee shall proceed with the investigation, and then voting to adjourn until next December.

Mr. BROOMALL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I certainly regret that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] should so far forget the proprieties of debate and the rules of this House as to cast reflections, if not malignant aspersions, upon one of the committees of the House. Sir, as a member of that committee, I defer to the great ability, the mature experience, and the revered age of the gentleman, but I believe that the committee which he charges with the intention of shrinking from the duty devolved upon them by the House are his peers in purity, integrity, and devotion to the interests of the country.

What duty was imposed upon the committee? Was it to report according to the notions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] upon common rumor and fame, a bill of impeachment? Was it to act upon the suggestions of gentlemen that the usurpation of the President in his public acts is so patent that we need no testimony? Sir, the committee would be untrue to themselves and the country should they make a report without careful and deliberate investigation.

The resolution of impeachment charges the President of the United States with corruption in the use of the veto power, in the use of the pardoning power, and in the use of the appointing power. Where is the evidence of that corruption? Is it in the statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or of any other gentleman in this House? No, sir. It is only to be determined by human testimony sanctioned by the obligations of an oath, and the Committee on the Judiciary have honestly and faithfully, day after day, with care and without prejudice, examined witnesses upon the subject. The charges to which I have referred, together with those in reference to corrupt interference in elections, and of corrupt disposal of the public property, not only justify but demand that the committee should investigate the matter with the deliberation and candor of a court, and in no other way. And when the gentleman, with all his ability, rises upon the floor of this House and imputes improper motives to the committee, charging them with a design to thwart the wishes of the House, and to shirk the duty imposed upon them, it is a gratuitous charge, unjust and undeserved, and one that I am sorry to hear from the distinguished and revered gentleman from Pennsylvania.

That committee may act unwisely in the estimation of the gentleman; they may not be possessed of his transcendent ability; but they will act with honesty and sincerity of purpose, with zeal and industry. And when the proper time comes, they will, with as much fearlessness and manhood as the gentleman from Pennsylvania can desire, report the result of their investigation to the House for their action.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to say that I intended to impugn the motives of no one. I spoke of the manner in which this investigation was being conducted, and stated my opinion that it was evidently leading to no result whatever.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to say that the amendment I have offered is not intended to interfere at all with the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE;] but I saw that his resolution was going to take up much time, the previous question on it not being seconded. It can be renewed, if the gentleman desires, immediately after mine is disposed of. If no other gentleman will renew it, I will renew it myself.

I desire to modify my amendment in two particulars. I propose to increase the number of days upon which the roll is to be called from four to five. And I change the phraseology, without at all changing the meaning, so as to accommodate the critical gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] I propose that it shall read "if at every such calling either the Senate or House of Representatives shall be found without a quorum, the said President and Speaker shall thereupon adjourn their respective Houses without day."

Mr. BINGHAM. I agree to that.

Mr. BROOMALL. I would rather not put it in the power of the Senate to prevent a session at that time. But I am satisfied we will have to yield that point. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I would ask my colleague [Mr. BROOMALL] if this resolution does not impart a license to the majority of both Houses to withhold their attendance here at that time?

Mr. BINGHAM. They have that license now.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. And will not the Senate be able to carry out their manifest determination to have no session before December next by not appearing here in July?

Mr. BROOMALL. If the gentleman will point out any mode by which we can compel the attendance of a quorum of the Senate I will agree to modify my resolution in that way. But that cannot be done. I insist upon the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

The reading of the amendment, as modified, being called for, it was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby instructed to adjourn their respective Houses at three o'clock p. m. on the 30th day of March, instant, to the first Wednesday in July, 1867, when the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives shall cause the roll of each House respectively to be read; and if there be no quorum present to be read; and shall adjourn from day to day for five successive days, and on each day the roll of the respective Houses shall be called, and if at every such calling either the Senate or House of Representatives shall be found without a quorum, the said President and Speaker shall thereupon adjourn their respective Houses without day.

The main question was then ordered—ayes 81, noes 27.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I call for the yeas and nays upon the question of agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 26, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Baker, Baldwin, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boatwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Calkins, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Judd, Kerr, Ketchum, Koontz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Mercur, Morrell, Morrissey, Niblack, Nicholson, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Platts, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Benton, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Coyode, Culliton, Donnelly, Ella Farnsworth, Gravely, Ingersoll, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Miller, O'Neill, Polsley, Schenck, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Thomas Williams, and John T. Wilson—26.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Cobb, Dawes, Eckley, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Haight, Harding, Hulbard, Hunter, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Neill, Orth, Paine, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Baum, Selye, Shollabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stone, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—50.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring on agreeing to the resolution as amended, it was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. BROOMALL. My resolution was intended as a substitute for the preamble as well as the resolution.

The SPEAKER. A substitute cannot be offered for both a resolution and a preamble.

Mr. BROOMALL. I hope, then, that the preamble will not be adopted. I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay the preamble on the table was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, as follows to their respective Houses:

That the House recede from their first amendment and agree to the second section of the bill, with the following amendment:

Add to the second section the following:

And the newspapers in the ten rebellious States named in section seven of an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, which have been or may be designated in pursuance of the provisions of said section for the publication of the public laws and treaties of the United States, shall publish the public laws and treaties of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, authentic copies of which it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to furnish as soon as possible after receiving notice of such designation. And there is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury from any moneys not otherwise appropriated a sum sufficient to pay for such service: Provided, That the accounts therefor shall be settled in the usual manner; and the compensation shall not exceed the rate fixed in section seven aforesaid.

That the House agree to the third amendment of the Senate to the fourth amendment of the House.

That the House agree to the fourth amendment of the Senate to the fourth amendment of the House, with an amendment as follows:

In line nine of said fourth amendment of the Senate strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen."

THADDEUS STEVENS,
CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.
LOT M. MORRILL,
GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] whether he has given attention to the question of the cost of publishing the laws in the manner proposed by section seven of the appropriation bill to which this amendment refers; whether he has compared the probable cost of publishing the laws in this way with the amounts we have heretofore paid for similar services? I am told by gentlemen who have examined the matter that under this amendment to the seventh section of the civil appropriation bill the Government will be obliged to pay about twelve times the amount which is now paid for publishing the laws and treaties of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman be kind enough to inform me by what language in the bill the compensation is increased at all?

Mr. NIBLACK. The increased expense results, I understand, from the different manner in which the pay is estimated. I am informed that under this bill the payment for publication will be computed by the document page, while by the law heretofore existing it is computed in some different manner. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the point. If he has not investigated it, I think it is worthy of investigation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. We have taken care in the proviso to limit the rate of payment to what has heretofore been paid for such service. Any increased expense is distinctly guarded against. The gentleman, I presume, has been misinformed, perhaps by some one who had looked at the provision before its form was finally agreed upon. The language was at one time, I believe, capable of a latitude of construction which might have allowed an increase in the rate of payment; but I think the gentleman will find on examination that the provision as now agreed upon will prevent anything of that kind.

As to the rate of payment to newspapers in this District, we have fixed it precisely as it was before. Although there were some suggestions that we ought to increase the rate, we have not done so. I think the gentleman from Indiana will find that he has been misinformed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am not prepared to make any positive statement in regard to the matter. I am not myself a practical printer, and do not understand the manner in which the payment for this sort of work is computed.

At all events, sir, I understand that it is proposed to go back and publish the laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress in full. This will involve a heavy expense.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. In the rebel States it goes back to the treaties and laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress not already published. Some of these laws which the gentleman speaks of the citizens of that part of the country would feel a particular interest in. It was thought proper that they should have a knowledge of these laws. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think a misapprehension exists in regard to a statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He was understood to state that the bill provides for the publication of the laws of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, with this addition, "not yet published." If the gentleman from Pennsylvania made that statement, and he was so understood, he is mistaken. Those words are not in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. They are not in the bill; but no one supposes they are to be published a second time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. A different officer is required by this bill to designate the papers in which they are to be published.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of State is required to furnish authentic copies of such papers.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I see nothing in the bill that will limit the officer to the publication only of those laws not already published. The bill will give him power to publish all the laws and treaties of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of State is specially required to furnish copies under this designation. I now insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning. I think this precaution is necessary.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand the last claim any one could think of has gone through. If that is so, there is no necessity of meeting before twelve o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has a resolution been received from the Senate to adjourn over until next July?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. It would have been reported from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BINGHAM. They provide if no quorum be found on the first roll-call the adjournment shall be without day. I hope we will wait until that resolution comes here.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The SPEAKER. It will require a two-thirds vote on a suspension of the rules to change the hour of meeting from twelve o'clock m. to ten a. m.

The House refused to suspend the rules.

IMPEACHMENT—AGAIN.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas upon charges preferred in the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Ninth Congress against the President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors alleged to have been committed by him in the execution of his official trust, the Committee on the Judiciary of the said House, to which the same was referred, did report that for want of sufficient time they were unable to conclude their investigation, but that upon the facts disclosed it was in their judgment required and demanded that the inquiry should be prosecuted to a conclusion by the present Congress; and whereas, in accordance with the said opinion, this House did commit the said subject anew to its Committee on the Judiciary, which is now diligently engaged in the examination thereof; and whereas, in view of the report and recommendation of the Judiciary Committee of the last House, it would be dangerous to the public interest, and failure of duty on the part of the present Congress, to adjourn and abdicate its practical control over the administration of the Government by surrendering its destinies in the present critical condition of affairs into the hands of an officer thus impeached before the nation, and well known not only to be hostile to the policy of its Congress, and to entertain the opinion that all the acts of that Congress looking to a restoration of the Union are unconstitutional; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to report on the charges preferred against the President, as aforesaid, on the first day of the meeting of the House after the recess hereafter to be determined.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Judiciary have a right to report at any time, and as this commands them to report, the Chair will rule that it will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I modify the resolution so as to say "requested," instead of "directed," and demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the Chair whether that will require the Judiciary Committee to make a final report or only such progress as they have made?

The SPEAKER. The resolution explains itself; it is a request to report on the first day of the adjourned session. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. SCHENCK. I raise the question of order that this resolution does not require a modification from "instruct" to "request" in order to carry it by a majority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will arrest the remark for the reason that the gentleman is not the author of the resolution. The gentleman from Kansas has modified his own resolution and demands the previous question.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 45, noes 37; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. CLARKE, of Kansas, and HUMPHREY.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 31.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to lay the resolution on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 63, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bingham, Blair, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Denison, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketchum, Ladin, Marshall, Marvin, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Plants, Robinson, Ross, Sigreaves, Stewart, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Wood—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eli, Farnsworth, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Malloy, McPlurg, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Polesley, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Cobb, Dawes, Dodge, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Haight, Harding, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hunter, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Newcomb, Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Seelye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Taft, Thomas, Twitchell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—63.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the preamble.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the preamble, which is inconsequential, will not be adopted. On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 37, noes 46.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. CLARKE, of Kansas, and GARFIELD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 50.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only desire to say that it seems to me, as we have now passed the substantial proposition which the gentleman has offered by a vote which manifestly expresses the sentiment of the House, it is improper for us to adopt a long preamble, reciting facts and in a quasi way committing the House to a proposition that ought not to be acted upon until the report of the committee is made.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman if he can name a single statement in this preamble which is not justified by the facts?

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to state generally upon this subject that when I came here to take my seat at the last session of Congress, I was ready, in case the House desired it, to proceed to a consideration of the question and determine what action should be taken in reference to the President of the United States. But after mature deliberation this House resolved to refer the whole subject to one of its standing committees, in order that there might be a complete and thorough examination of the question. From that moment forward I laid the whole matter by, awaiting the action of that committee. Since that time I have not taken it up even in my own mind for investigation. I have been unwilling since that time to give a vote upon the subject until I heard from the committee.

Whenever that committee shall make its report, I shall be ready to consider it and act upon my personal responsibility in regard to it. But I object to being forced to vote upon any resolution drawn up and offered by any member which shall foreshadow a decision of the question or intimate any particular decision one way or the other to which we should come. I would not to-day vote that Andrew Johnson ought to be impeached, nor would I vote that he ought not to be impeached, for the very reason that we have committed that question to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I think we are bound in a judicial way to wait for their report.

I object that a resolution very brief and very proper shall have so long a tail to it as this preamble. I very strongly suspect that this tail was the object of the gentleman rather than the resolution itself. I was willing to give him his resolution; I voted for it. And I am entirely willing to vote for the first two whereases of this preamble if the gentleman desires to deal in that article, for they merely recite the history of this case up to this time. But when he comes to the last whereas, which declares that the President is impeached by the American people, I am unwilling to vote for it until I hear what our committee, to whom was referred this whole subject, has to say in the premises. I am willing the first two whereases shall stand if the gentleman from Kansas will consent to strike out the last one. I am willing to compromise with him on that. If he will not consent to that I shall move to lay the whole preamble on the table. We are to pass resolutions, not to obtain credit for long speeches in the way of preambles.

I now yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. For a question; certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. I only desire to say, that after having given this subject a great deal of attention as a listener merely, for I have said but little upon it, I have come to the deliberate conclusion that we are very badly demoralized, not only upon the impeachment question, but upon the question of adjournment. And I feel very anxious as to what will be the result.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman says "we are very badly demoralized." I suppose "we" means the gentlemen on his side of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to read these objectionable whereas sentence by sentence, especially the last one, and see what there is so very bad in them:

And whereas in view of the report and recommendation of the Judiciary Committee of the last House it would be dangerous to the public interest and a failure of duty on the part of the present Congress to adjourn and abdicate its practical control over the administration of the Government—

Let us stop here for a moment. Does anybody vote against that who is an earnest man on this subject of impeachment? "In view of the report of our committee and the past action of the House, it would be dangerous to adjourn and abdicate our control over the destinies of this country." That is all the preamble amounts to thus far. What else does it say?

Over the administration of the Government, by surrendering its destinies in the present critical condition of affairs into the hands of an officer thus impeached.

"Thus impeached." That is, impeached by the report of our committee, so far as it does so. Not impeached in the judgment of anybody in the House, but "thus impeached" by the report. That is the proposition—

Before the nation, and well known not only to be hostile to the policy of its Congress.

Sir, let me look in the face of any gentleman who desires to vote that Andrew Johnson is not "well known to be hostile to the policy of Congress." Such a man would be a curiosity.

But to entertain the opinion that all the acts of Congress looking to the restoration of the Union are unconstitutional.

Does not Andrew Johnson "entertain the opinion that all the acts of Congress looking to restoration are unconstitutional?" Then we say in the preamble only that by the judgment of the committee and by the action of the House we have so far impeached him that we think it is not safe for us to abdicate and thus trust the interests of this great nation to his control. Now, sir, if there is any one who is at all tender-footed on this question—and I know that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] never is so on any subject—I ask him to think upon it. So far as Andrew Johnson has been impeached by the action of our committee, and so far as the action of Congress in coming together here at this session declares that Andrew Johnson is not to be trusted with control, in so far do we declare that we cannot surrender the control of the destinies of this country into the hands of one who believes that every act of this Congress is unconstitutional.

Why, sir, if Andrew Johnson is the bold man that he is claimed to be, if he is a man of any executive ability, if he has any conscience, what is his duty when this Congress adjourns? He says he believes that all our reconstruction acts are unconstitutional, and therefore void; and it is his duty, if he is in earnest and is bold enough to do it, if he is conscientious in his belief that they are unconstitutional, it is his duty as one of the coordinate branches of the Government, having a right to construe the Constitution for himself just as much as we have the right to construe it for ourselves, to withdraw from the South all the troops put there under our unconstitutional acts and turn over the control of affairs to the State governments which he has inaugurated and which he believes to be constitutional, saying, "I will submit this matter to the Supreme Court. I as the Executive, I as a part of the legislative power of the country, have the right to deal with this matter of the constitutionality of the law until I am overruled by the Judiciary; and believing upon my conscience and before my God that these acts are unconstitutional, it is my duty to interpose between an unconstitutional military government and the true constitutional civil governments which I have set up."

I do not know whether the President is either bold enough or conscientious enough to take that position; but if he is sincere in the convictions which he has announced, and if he follows the dictates of his conscience, this is what he would do. And we propose to abdicate and give him an opportunity to do it. And my friend from Ohio—for a good reason no doubt, because he never does anything except for what to his mind appears a good reason—declares that we ought thus to abdicate our place and power.

Why, sir, without the preamble the resolution means nothing. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That the committee report on the acts of the President aforesaid.

Strike out the preamble, and to what "acts aforesaid" does the resolution refer? Without the preamble the resolution is unmeaning. My friend from Ohio has used the comparison of a "tail." Let me say that this resolution without the preamble is the tail with the body gone, the head gone, everything gone but the tail, and this tail about as useless as the second tail to a cat. You must have some preamble.

I did not write a word of this resolution; I was not consulted upon its form; but I am always ready to adopt good doctrine wherever I find it; and I trust that if we are in earnest; if we mean what we say; if we are not afraid to act boldly and firmly; if we do not want to fritter away our rights; if we do not desire to make our acts and words agree by puckering a little here and stretching a little there, as a little girl does her patch-work to make it fit, rather than take our stand upon an independent and high position, I hope we shall meet this question as legislators, boldly, clearly, fully, saying that this man is so far impeached as we find him to be. If we do not dare to say that, then we ought to go quietly home, and say that we have not impeached him at all, that we have nothing to say on this subject, but that he stands acquitted.

One thing further, and I will be much obliged to my friend for the time he has given me. He says he came here with his mind made up on this question of impeachment, but since it has gone to the Judiciary Committee he has not any opinion on the subject. I know my friend will not understand me as saying anything personal to himself, because his mind is never operated upon except by good impulses. A good many of us came here with our minds made up on this question of impeachment, but since we came here we have had our minds changed. Some from proper motives, like my friend from Ohio, and some of us because the further we get from our constituents the less we stand up straight and the more we sink down weak in the knees. I want the gentleman to understand in every form; I do not believe it of him, but I do believe it of whosoever the description fits! If any gentleman takes it up, we will know that it fits him.

Mr. Speaker, let us stand up as we did before our constituents. If I went before my constituents and said I would do a thing, as did some gentlemen, I would do it if it took my right hand. I know my friend would also do what he promised. I hope we will not vote down the preamble and say to the country after all we are afraid when we come to face the real issue.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts reads from this preamble the statement which I propose to strike out, that it is dangerous for this Congress to adjourn; and he wants to know if any one doubts that it is. I answer that this House, less than half an hour ago voted, by 96 to 26, it was not dangerous to adjourn, and they voted they should adjourn to-morrow. Now, if the gentleman's view is that it is dangerous, he only differs with three-fourths of the House of Representatives.

That is my answer to his first statement; and that answer includes another one. It proves the head and tail were not made out of pieces of the same color, for we began with the preamble and resolution to adjourn, and we passed the resolution to adjourn and laid the preamble on the table; and in the next five minutes the same preamble comes up as a tail to a proposition to request the Judiciary Committee to make a report. It shows this preamble can be used as fish, flesh, or fowl. It can be made to suit the palate of the gentleman who desires to eat.

My friend from Massachusetts believes that this preamble is exceedingly proper and pertinent, because it declares it dangerous for Congress to adjourn; it being dangerous for Congress to adjourn, therefore resolved, when it does adjourn and meet again, the Committee on the Judiciary shall be requested to report on a certain subject. This is cogent logic! If gentlemen want to commit themselves to such an absurd non sequitur, I leave it to their sense and logic to do so.

As we have laid the preamble on the table once to-day, I think we shall not be considered tender-footed if we lay it on the table once more.

Another thing, the gentleman takes up a statement in the preamble to which I have objected, that the nation has impeached the President, and he goes on to say that in a certain sense he is impeached and the House ought to stay here to attend to it. How is he impeached when a committee has only been appointed to investigate the charges? Can a man be said to be hanged who is only arrested and put on trial for murder? How far is he hanged if he is not hanged at all? [Laughter.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

IMPEACHMENT—AGAIN.

Mr. FARNSWORTH (at five o'clock) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to lay the preamble on the table.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being put on laying the preamble on the table, there were—ayes 52, noes 32.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. CLARKE, of Kansas, and ROB- INSON.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 32.

So the preamble was laid on the table.

Mr. ELDREDGE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the action of the Senate on the concurrent resolution of the House in reference to the adjournment of Congress, which was reported, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the foregoing resolution of the House of Representatives relative to the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after "that" where it first occurs in said resolution, and insert as follows:

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby directed to adjourn their respective Houses on Saturday, March 30, 1867, at twelve o'clock meridian, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867, at noon, when the roll of each House shall be immediately called, and immediately thereafter the Presiding Officer of each House shall cause the Presiding Officer of the other House to be informed whether or not a quorum of its body has appeared; and thereupon, if a quorum of the two Houses respectively shall not have appeared upon such call of the rolls, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall immediately adjourn their respective Houses without day.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to concur, and call the previous question.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask the gentleman to yield for an amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I decline.

Mr. BROOMALL. I hope it will not be seconded.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the Speaker if it would not be his duty, if this amendment of the Senate is adopted, to adjourn the House when it meets in July, even though it be full and there are only half of the members of the Senate in session?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer that by the amendment of the Senate. If a quorum should not be present in both Houses on the first Wednesday in July, the Presiding Officers would be required to adjourn the two Houses.

Mr. BINGHAM. But if there is a quorum in both Houses then the other part of the resolution has no effect.

The SPEAKER. It would have no effect whatever.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the previous question should not be seconded would it not then be in order for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] to offer his amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would then be open to amendment.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 50, noes 45; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the yeas and nays on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 30, noes 63.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 53, noes 45, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baldwin, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Cake, Chanler, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Getz, Gloss-brenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Laflin, Mallory, Marvin, Mercer, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Pile, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Seefeld, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Van Auker, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Wood, and Woodbridge—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Ela, Farnsworth, Garfield, Hooper, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, McClurg, Miller, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Polsley, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—45.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cornell, Dawes, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fields, Finney, Fox, Gravely, Haight, Harding, Hill, Hulburd, Hunter, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Marshall, McCarthy, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Newcomb, Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—66.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company, of New York, the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a sub-marine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe via the Bermudas and Azores Islands;

An act (S. No. 105) to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) relative to the payment of expenses incurred by the judges of election for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 48) in relation to the execution of surveys of rivers ordered by Congress; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 43) in relation to the educational interests of the District of Columbia.

SURVEY OF ILLINOIS RIVER.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of Brevet Major General J. H. Wilson upon the survey and examination of the Illinois river, when presented, seven hundred and fifty extra copies for the use of the House, and two hundred and fifty for the use of the Bureau of Engineers.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF ROCK RIVER.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the same committee, also reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of Brevet Major General J. H. Wilson upon the survey and examination of the Rock river, when presented, seven hundred and fifty extra copies for the use of the House, and two hundred and fifty for the use of the Bureau of Engineers.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of March 7, 1867, transmitting a report by the Paymaster General relative to the pay received by officers of the Army; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. FERRY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, asking for a grant of land for a railroad from the mining regions of the upper peninsula to Minnissing, on the straits of Mackinaw; which was ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands when appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet at ten o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That will require a suspension of the rules, the time of daily meeting being fixed by a rule of the House.

The rules were suspended, two thirds voting in the affirmative; and the motion of Mr. BROOMALL was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

SEEDS FOR THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the rules be suspended, in order that the joint resolution of the Senate No. 51, authorizing the transfer of certain funds and providing for the purchase of seeds and their distribution in the southern States, may be taken from the Speaker's table and considered by the House at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the joint resolution be read.

The joint resolution was read at length. It transfers the sum of $50,000 from the funds in charge of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands and places it to the credit of the Department of Agriculture, and directs the Commissioner of Agriculture to employ that sum for the purchase of improved varieties of vegetables and cereals and their distribution in the southern States.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules, and (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The joint resolution was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 84, noes 53.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. This joint resolution proposes to transfer $50,000 from the Freedmen's Bureau to the Agricultural Department for the purchase and distribution of seeds in the southern States. I have had some conversation with General Howard upon this subject, and he thinks that the agents of his bureau in the southern States can perform this duty more satisfactorily than it can be performed under any system devised by the Agricultural Bureau. I desire to offer an amendment, to place this duty in charge of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. WOOD. I would inquire what is the character of seeds contemplated by this joint resolution?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Garden seeds and cereals.

Mr. WOOD. The only kind of seed that can be used to much advantage in the South is cotton seed. It is now too late to supply cotton seed to the southern States for this year. I do not wish to object to this joint resolution. I only want to know for what good purpose this $50,000 can be expended this year.

Mr. KELLEY. To furnish the hardy mountaineers, who to-day have no food or seed to plant, with seed to grow food for themselves and their families.

Mr. WOOD. The mountainous region of the southern States does not embrace one twentieth of their area.

Mr. KELLEY. I know something of the geography of the South; and I know that $50,000 will not be enough to supply seed to those who would gladly till the soil and raise food for their families.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. If they have land they can purchase seed; if not, the seed will be of no use to them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Upon reflection, I fear the amendment I have offered may delay the joint resolution so as to kill it for lack of time in the Senate. And as the main object is to supply seed to those who are destitute, I will withdraw my amendment. I now call the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and read a third time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

On the motion there were—ayes 23, noes 60. So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the passage of the joint resolution,

Mr. EGGLESTON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House in relation to the iron-clad monitor Camanche.

TESTIMONY IN IMPEACHMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the Committee on the Judiciary, whenever they may report the testimony in the matter of the impeachment of the President, have leave to report it in print, if they shall so decide.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. CAKE: The petition of Henry T. Bnor and others, citizens of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, setting forth the shostrate condition of the coal trade of Pennsylvania, and praying Congress to take early action upon the tariff question.

By Mr. COBURN: A memorial from J. J. Fiddick and others, members of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Danville, Indiana, asking an increase of bounties.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 30, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House relative to the adjournment of Congress; and that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) authorizing the transfer of certain funds and providing for the purchase of seeds and their distribution in the southern States.

CAPITOL WATCHMEN.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is on the table a bill which it is necessary to pass to perfect the police regulations of the Capitol, according to the recent law passed by both branches. I move that House bill No. 79 be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that we had better go through the morning business, presenting reports, resolutions, &c. I have a resolution or two to offer and a report to make.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This bill had better be passed first. It will have to go back to the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not object to the taking up of this particular bill under the circumstances.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the eight watchmen on the dome of the Capitol, at the congressional stables, the gate-keeper, and watchmen of the grounds surrounding the Capitol, be hereafter appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House. These are also to appoint three additional watchmen, one for each of the eastern porticos and the carriage-ways under the same. Each watchman so appointed is to receive an annual compensation of $1,000, payable on the order of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, or either of them, and the amount of money necessary to pay these watchmen from the date of their appointment until the end of the present fiscal year is appropriated; and for their compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, $11,000 is appropriated. For the compensation of an additional lieutenant and private of the Capitol police, authorized to be appointed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses of Congress, from the date of their appointment until the close of the present fiscal year, at the rate paid others of the same grade, so much money as may be necessary is appropriated; and for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1868, $3,300 is appropriated.

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House are further authorized to select a pattern for a uniform for the Capitol police and watchmen, and furnish to each member of the force two suits per year, at a cost not to exceed fifty dollars per suit, and also to furnish the force with the necessary belts, arms, &c., at a cost not to exceed twenty dollars per man; and the amount of money necessary to carry this provision into effect is appropriated, payable upon the certificate of the officers above named. One-half of the moneys hereinbefore appropriated are to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate, and the other half into the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The second section makes it the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses to take charge of the Capitol building, protect it from defacement, &c., and authorizes them to cause the arrest of persons guilty of improper conduct within the building or on the grounds surrounding it.

Section three repeals all inconsistent laws.

Mr. CONKLING. I offer an amendment, to come in after section two as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all moneys appropriated for the Washington aqueduct, and for the other public works of the District of Columbia, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

I offer this amendment to carry out the intention of the two Houses in reference to the expenditure of this money. It was stated the other day that it would be expended under the direction of the War Department; but it turns out, upon investigation, that although it is to be expended under the direction of the chief Engineer of the Army, the statutes, as they stand, leave the matter within the control entirely of the Interior Department, so that the effect is to transfer the chief Engineer as an officer of the War Department, and make him a subordinate of the Department of the Interior, or, as the head of one of the Departments expressed it to me, to make him a book-keeper of the Interior Department. He is an officer who, for reasons which I might state if it were worth while to consume time in doing so, cannot be spared from his functions, which are constant and important at the War Department, and if this expenditure is to be made under his direction the money should be paid upon the requisition of that Department, and the power to control it should be where the responsibility is. That was the design. That was the understanding of the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] who said the other day that it would be expended under the authority and supervision of the War Department. As it stands now it leads to confusion; an officer of the War Department is made really subject to the control of the Interior Department, and becomes a disbursing officer there. I have a letter, which I need not read, and I have facts in regard to it which I will state if there is any doubt about the proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not see any objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

T. HYATT'S PATENT.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate copies of all papers connected with the extension of patent to Thaddeus Hyatt by the Commissioner of Patents November 4, 1859.

RETURN OF DUTIES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to submit an amendment to the bill (S. No. 76) providing for abatement of duties on merchandise damaged on the voyage of importation, that it may be printed so as to be on the files whenever the bill shall come up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received informally, and ordered to be printed.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, made during the last year, and that the same be printed when received.

It is quite a short document, and the Committee on the Pacific Railroad need it very much.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME.

Mr. CORBETT. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 122) for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District of Columbia. There is no more important business to do. It will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, in the District of Columbia, organized under an act of the 25th of July, 1866, amended by the act of the 22d of February, 1867, to be expended under the direction of the officers of the institution.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF SESSION.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the time for the adjournment of the two Houses be extended until three o'clock p. m.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope there will be no objection. I understand that the resolution is offered at the instance of the friends of the deceased colleague of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is offered with the understanding that we shall close our legislative labors at the proper time, I have no objection; but I object to extending the session for the purpose of going on with legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will simply state—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to make a statement. I have reason to believe that immediately after the close of our legislative session there will be a called session of the Senate for the consideration of executive business. I do not know what influence that may have on the action of the Senate on continuing its legislative term, but I make the statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. I do not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the resolution is taken up, I wish to inquire of Senators what effect they think it will have on the resolution we have passed to adjourn at twelve o'clock to-day? Will it affect the resolution we have passed, or will it provide for the same adjournment for which that provided, at three o'clock instead of at twelve o'clock?

Mr. DAVIS. Permit me to make a word of explanation. The deceased Senator, from Delaware was my messmate, and I am acting in concert with his surviving colleague and at the instance of his family. We desire that the session shall be protracted from twelve to three o'clock, and that precisely at twelve o'clock the ordinary notice of the death of Senator RIDDLE shall be taken in the Senate, and shall be sent for concurrence to the House, and that the Senate then shall adjourn, as it would have adjourned, at twelve o'clock if there had been no such proceedings.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think this resolution will alter the original resolution of adjournment except as to the time, but an amendment can easily be added to obviate any difficulty on that point.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest that this resolution read, "that the concurrent resolution of the two Houses be amended by substituting three o'clock p. m. for twelve o'clock m., where those words first occur in said resolution."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That resolution is not now before us, and I hardly see how it can be amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend that there can be no difficulty about this. It is proposed to extend the session to three o'clock instead of twelve o'clock, of course under the same terms and conditions that the resolution relative to adjournment at twelve o'clock provided; but if anybody has any doubt on that point, the words "under the same terms and conditions as the two Houses have agreed upon" can be added. Certainly no one wishes to adjourn abruptly on an occasion like this.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I modify the resolution so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the time of adjournment of the two Houses be extended until three o'clock p. m., subject to the provisions of the resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of Congress, already passed by the two Houses.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that this resolution be laid aside for a few moments. I think there had better be a little further conference about it.

The motion was agreed to.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. CAMERON. I move to take up the resolution which I offered yesterday, making an inquiry of the War Department.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. CAMERON:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what amount of money has been paid by the United States to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for transportation during the war, what rates were paid to that railroad for such service, whether the compensation paid was greater than that allowed to other railroads for the performance of like services, and if so, why such higher rates were so paid to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad; also, what amount of money is still claimed by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company as due that company by the United States, and for what services such balance, if any, is so claimed, together with the amount due the United States by the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for the use of engines, cars, &c., furnished by the Government to that company during the war, and whether any claim has been made by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for damages to their road by reason of military operations, whether any moneys have been paid them on account of such damages, and what amount, if any, has been so paid by the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the resolution by adding to it:

And the Secretary is also directed to furnish information of like kind in relation to the Northern Central and the Pennsylvania Railroad companies respectively.

Mr. CAMERON. I accept that amendment as a modification of my resolution.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. By the thirty-seventh rule of the Senate, "nominations neither approved nor rejected during the session at which they are made shall not be acted upon at any succeeding session without being again made by the President." As we are to have an executive session immediately following this legislative session, I move to suspend for this session the clause of the thirty-seventh rule which I have read, and that the nominations be proceeded with at the next executive session of the Senate as if no adjournment had taken place.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses be suspended for the residue of the session.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 35) to authorize the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at certain military posts.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) authorizing the transfer of certain funds and providing for the purchase of seeds and their distribution in the southern States; and the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the iron-clad monitor Comanche; and they were signed by the President pro tempore.

COMMITTEE ON ORDNANCE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives proposing an additional joint rule to provide for the appointment of a joint committee on ordnance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. The resolution need not be read. The Committee on Military Affairs propose to amend it by striking out all after the word "That" and inserting:

A joint committee of six, consisting of three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives, be appointed to investigate the purchases, contracts, and experiments of the ordnance department, and that the said committee be authorized to employ a clerk and a stenographer, and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and that they have leave to report at any time.

I will simply say that the House of Representatives asked for the appointment of a joint standing committee. It was on reflection thought best not to have such a standing committee, as it would bring here everybody proposing to sell different kinds of arms, &c., but to have a special committee to make a thorough investigation; and I will say that I think one member should be appointed from the Committee on Military Affairs, one from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and one from the other members of the Senate, and I will say in no event can I consent to serve on this special committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has probably escaped the attention of my friend from Massachusetts that since the House sent us this proposition they have adopted a resolution of their own sending this same inquiry to the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, and the members of the House who initiated this ordnance inquiry are members of that committee, and that committee in sub-dividing its labor has given this branch of inquiry to those members of the House who were specially interested in it, and I suppose they have commenced their labor. Now, then, it appears to me to be, to say the least of it, useless to have two committees pursuing precisely the same course of inquiry, two joint select committees doing exactly the same thing, one under the order of the House of Representatives and another under the order of the two Houses. I should hope, therefore, that this amendment would not be adopted, and that the resolution would be laid aside. Of course if there is any want of confidence on the part of the Senate or of the Military Committee or of the House of Representatives in the capacity and faithfulness of those members of the Committee on Retrenchment who have this matter in charge, then it is very proper to pass this resolution, and the members of that committee who are thus reflected upon will of course have it in their power to relieve themselves from any further labor in that direction by resigning their place. As it is, I cannot see the benefit of having a double inquiry with double power to send for persons and papers, double power to appoint clerks, have officers, expend money on precisely the same subject.

Mr. WILSON. I will say that what the Senator refers to had not escaped my attention, but the very men who did that are pressing the appointment of this committee. They pressed it on me yesterday, and are doing it to-day. I have no doubt that this is the proper way to treat the subject. I think the other course adopted by the House was very improper, and I have no doubt that if this committee is ordered the joint Committee on Retrenchment will stop its inquiry on this matter as it should stop. I know no reason, indeed, why that committee should have the care of a matter of this kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ought to have said before, perhaps, so as to be entirely understood, that this branch of inquiry which was committed to the joint Committee on Retrenchment is one with which I have no connection. I am not on that sub-committee, but I think it but just to the subject that the two Houses should not be running parallels of this description.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to—ayes eighteen, noes not counted.

Messrs. HOWARD, CAMERON, and DRAKE were subsequently appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

CONDENSED REPORTS.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be authorized to enter into a contract, in the name of the Senate, with Richard Sutton, to furnish condensed or synoptical reports of the proceedings and debates of the Senate, the same to be free to the press of the country, or to any authorized agency thereof; such contract to continue for a period not exceeding one year, and to be submitted to the Senate for approval.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the resolution. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

DEATH OF SENATOR RIDDLE.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask leave to withdraw the concurrent resolution I offered a few moments ago, and I present in place of it the following:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a joint committee be appointed, consisting of three members of the Senate and five members of the House, to attend the remains of Hon. GEORGE READ RIDDLE, late a member of the Senate; to his home.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to; and Messrs. DAVIS, RAMSEY, and NYE were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to report from the committee of conference on the subject of adjournment of the two Houses that they could not agree. I present the papers, and move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS BEFORE COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That all subjects before the Senate at the close of the present session, including those before committees, shall be continued to the next session, and shall then be proceeded with in the same manner as if no adjournment of the Senate had taken place; and the papers which have been referred to the committees, and may be in their possession at the close of the session, shall be returned informally to the Secretary, and by him restored to the committees when appointed at the next session.

SUFFRAGE TO COLORED CITIZENS.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to give notice that I shall on the first Wednesday of July ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill No. 115; being a bill to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator had better add "or some subsequent day." [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senate to take notice that there will be a session on the first Wednesday of July to proceed with business. I have reason to believe that there will be a quorum here on that occasion, for there will be important public business that must be attended to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Reddick McKee, and that he have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That Albert Greenleaf have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE IN NEBRASKA.

On motion of Mr. THAYER, the bill (S. No. 86) extending to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the grant made by law of the 2d day of July, 1862, to each State of land equal to thirty thousand acres for each of its Senators and Representatives in Congress, for the purpose of establishing agricultural colleges, shall be extended to the State of Nebraska in the same manner as if Nebraska had been a State of the Union at the date of the passage of that law.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE CHAPLAIN.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 22, for the payment of Mr. BOYNTON, the Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 22) to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The resolution, as passed by the House of Representatives, provided that Rev. CHARLES B. BOYNTON is authorized to draw the amount appropriated to the payment of the Chaplain of the House for the Fortieth Congress, and that a sum sufficient to pay him the usual salary for the present fiscal year should be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend so as to read:

That Rev. CHARLES B. BOYNTON is authorized to draw the amount appropriated by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1868," to the payment of the Chaplain of the House for the Fortieth Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the resolution read a third time. The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to suspend the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules for the residue of the session.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 114) amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 35) to authorize the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at military posts; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

LIGHTING OF STREETS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to take up the joint resolution that I introduced yesterday on the subject of lighting the streets of Washington.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia.

As the mayor of Washington has given notice that the arrangements now in force for lighting the streets of the city are to cease at the end of the present month, and as it is necessary for the comfort and protection of the law-abiding citizens of the city that the street lamps shall continue to be lighted, as they now are, twenty-one nights in each month, from dark until daylight, in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government," approved July 28, 1866, the resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, in case of the failure of the municipal authorities of Washington city to carry out the present arrangements for lighting the streets of the city, to levy and collect a tax from the property-holders of Washington sufficient to defray the expenses of lighting the streets of the city twenty-one nights in each month, from dark until daylight.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a resolution which I have seen on our tables, but it appears to me it ought not to pass. It provides that there shall be less light in the streets than there used to be to save gas. It is dark enough as it is. We can hardly get along now.

Mr. HARLAN. This resolution provides that the light shall be continued.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object to it, then. The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

VOTING PLACES IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 121, authorizing and requiring the judges of election in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to designate and establish voting places therein.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It requires the judges of election in the city of Washington to designate and establish in each ward in the city so many voting places as shall enable all the voters therein conveniently to cast their votes on the same day at any election which shall be held therein.

Mr. HOWARD. I would inquire of the honorable Senator from West Virginia how many voting places there are now in the city of Washington? I inquire merely for information.

Mr. WILLEY. I understand that in some of the wards there are sufficient voting places to accommodate the voters; but in one or two wards, the number of which I have forgotten now, there are but two voting places, as I understand, and that is not sufficient—so it is represented from satisfactory sources—to enable all the voters to cast their votes on the same day conveniently.

Mr. HOWARD. Is there more than one voting place in each ward?

Mr. WILLEY. There are one or two wards that have more than one voting place.

Mr. HOWARD. Is there any ward in which there is no voting place?

Mr. WILLEY. No, sir; this bill simply authorizes the judges of election, who are appointed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, to designate and appoint a sufficient number of voting places to enable all the voters to cast their votes.

Mr. HOWARD. That is right.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I wish to ask a question. Under the present law I should like to understand how the places of election are designated. What has been the authority?

Mr. HARLAN. I can say for the information of the Senator from Pennsylvania that this makes no change in the existing law, except that it authorizes these officers to increase the number of voting places.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The judges of election are to make the change?

Mr. HARLAN. It authorizes the same officers who were previously authorized to control the subject.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I never before heard that judges of election had anything to do with fixing the places of election.

Mr. HARLAN. That is the provision of the charter of the city.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I have nothing to say about it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 64) to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House providing for the appointment of a joint Committee on Ordnance.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 64) to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 114) amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory; and

A bill (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes.

SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following proclamation of the President of the United States:

By the President of the United States of America:

A Proclamation.

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on Monday, the first day of April next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, have considered it to be my duty to issue this my proclamation, declaring that an extraordinary occasion requires the Senate of the United States to convene for the transaction of business at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, on Monday, the first day of April next, at twelve o'clock, on that day, of which all who shall at that time be entitled to act as members of that body are hereby required to take notice.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States, at Washington, the thirtieth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-first,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:
WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 107) to establish certain post roads, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 86) extending to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges, and the bill (S. No. 122) for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 22) to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOYNTON as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed on the part of the Senate to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States, and to inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make, the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, are ready to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORGAN and Mr. HENDRICKS as the committee on the part of the Senate.

POST ROADS.

The bill (H. R. No. 107) to establish certain post roads was read twice by its title.

Mr. RAMSEY. I ask to have that bill put on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that he had this day approved and signed the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 64) to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 99) for the relief of Richard Busted, jr.;

A bill (S. No. 100) supplementary to an act for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral of the United States Navy;

A bill (S. No. 114) amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 41) for the purchase of land adjoining the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) authorizing the transfer of certain funds and providing for the purchase of seeds and their distribution in the southern States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 53) relating to the transportation of troops by the Isthmus route to the Pacific States and Territories.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. J. A. LOGAN of Illinois, and Mr. B. F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, the special Committee on Ordnance on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that if he had no further communication to make Congress was ready to adjourn, and had appointed Mr. A. H. LAFLIN and Mr. JAMES BROOKS the committee on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a committee to accompany the remains of Senator RIDDLE.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 86) extending to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges, and the bill (S. No. 122) for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District of Columbia; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate resolve itself into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were again opened.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORGAN, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, reported that the President had no further communication to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at twelve o'clock.) The hour fixed by concurrent resolution of the two Houses for that purpose having arrived, the Senate stands adjourned until the first Wednesday of July, at noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 30, 1867.

The House met at ten o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, offered prayer in the following language:

Almighty God, Creator and Preserver of all things and Redeemer of men through Jesus Christ Thy Son: once more before Thy throne we come to mingle our thanksgiving and our prayers, offering our morning worship through our High Priest and Mediator, Jesus Christ.

We thank Thee, O God, that on this last day of the first session of this Congress we can look back and see how much Thou hast enabled men to do to promote human liberty, the security of human rights, the establishment of justice as the foundation of our national policy and for the general benefit of our race. We bless Thee, O God, that Thou hast enabled these public men to do so much toward restoring order and peace to this once distracted land, and that, as the battle-cloud has passed away, so the political battle, as we trust, is drawing to a close, to be succeeded by a universal calm. We thank Thee for the wisdom that has guided these deliberations, for the courage with which Thou hast inspired them, for the steadfastness with which they have adhered to the truth and to righteousness. God be praised for it all.

And now, as these public servants are about to separate, follow them, we beseech Thee, individually with Thy blessing. May the peace of God, that passeth all understanding, rest on all their hearts. May they be guarded on their homeward journey from the perils that beset the traveler. May their dear households all be safely kept, and they be permitted to meet them all in peace. During the interval between this time and the period of their reassembling keep Thou them in health and strength. Let not sickness lay any low, nor sudden stroke of death. And when they come once more together, then, O God, we pray that they may be enabled to look forth upon a country reunited in great part through their own labors and the blessing of God. May they behold a country American indeed, one in which the principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ shall be the animating spirit of public policy. O Lord, when all our earthly labors are over, may we meet to labor in Thy heavenly Kingdom for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the iron-clad monitor Comanche; when the Speaker signed the same.

GOVERNMENT OF MARYLAND.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask leave to present a memorial from the mayor and members of the city council of Baltimore, asking Congress to assist the people of Maryland to form a State government republican in form and in unison with the spirit of the age. I desire that this memorial may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the memorial will be received, and will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the memorial must be presented under the rule.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. WOOD. I object to any member occupying the time of the House by the presentation of these private memorials.

Mr. THOMAS. This is from the mayor and city council of Baltimore.

Mr. WOOD. If it is from the mayor and city council I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the memorial was received, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. BENTON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House tenders its special thanks to Major General P. H. Sheridan for the removal (by order of No. 5, issued on the 27th instant) of Andrew S. Herron, attorney general of the State of Louisiana; John T. Monroe, mayor of New Orleans; and Edmund Abel, judge of the first district court of New Orleans, from their respective offices, which they have disgraced, and the appointment in their places of men of character and loyalty, in the persons of B. L. Lynch as attorney general of said State, Edward Heath as mayor, and W. W. Howe as first district judge of said city; and that in this prompt and just action of General Sheridan the country has a guarantee that under his command the innocent will be protected, the guilty punished, and the spirit of rebellion extinguished.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER. I object.

Mr. BENTON. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROOKS. It will only lead to a call of the House and show no quorum.

The SPEAKER. There is in the opinion of the Chair a quorum present; though it is somewhat doubtful.

Mr. BENTON. I will withdraw for the present the motion to suspend the rules.

HOUSE MESSENGERS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution authorizing the Door-keeper to retain the number of messengers now employed during the recess shall be construed to include those employed by the House at three dollars a day, if he chooses to retain them.

Mr. ROSS. Does that increase the number?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It does not increase the number, but is necessary because there is doubt what the word "messenger" means.

Mr. ROSS. Does it increase the expense?

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not. It merely makes these boys eligible to these appointments.

Mr. ROSS. If it does not increase the expense I do not object.

The resolution was passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRADERS AT MILITARY POSTS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to go to business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The first business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 35, to authorize the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at certain military posts; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the Commanding General of the Army to permit a trading establishment to be maintained after the 1st of July, 1867, at any military post on the frontier not in the vicinity of any city or town, and situated at any point between the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich and the eastern boundary of the State of California, when, in his judgment, such establishment is needed for the accommodation of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens; but after the commissary department is prepared to supply stores to soldiers, as required by law, no trader permitted to remain at such post is to sell any goods kept by the commissary department to any enlisted man; and such traders are to be under protection and military control as camp-followers.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask that that joint resolution be put on its passage. It is important to traders and others who cross the plains. I have crossed the plains myself and know the necessity for it. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Let it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield for that.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 51; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported only eighteen in the affirmative, noes not counted.

So (no further count being asked) the House refused to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLORADO TERRITORY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 114, amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory; which was read a first and second time. The bill provides that hereafter the sessions of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory shall be biennial. Members of the Council shall be elected for the term of four years, and members of the House for the term of two years, and shall receive the sum of six dollars per day instead of three dollars heretofore allowed, and shall also receive the same mileage now allowed by law. It further provides that each House shall have authority to elect, in addition to the officers now allowed by law, an enrolling clerk, who shall receive five dollars per day. The chief clerk shall receive six dollars per day, and the other officers elected by said Legislature shall receive five dollars per day each. It further provides that the members of the Legislative Assembly elected at the general election of said Territory in the year 1867, shall compose the first Legislature under this act, and said Legislature shall meet at the time now fixed by law for the meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The organic acts of the several Territories have all been amended so that their sessions shall hereafter be biennial; and the compensation of the members has been doubled, but the aggregate length of time allowed for the Legislatures to sit remains the same. It was supposed that Colorado was included in the previous act, but on examination it was found that that Territory was excepted, and this is a repetition of the act which was passed in relation to the other Territories.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in all the other Territories the compensation of members of the Legislature is six dollars per day?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It has been doubled.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it six dollars per day?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. In some of the Territories, in Montana and Idaho, it is eight dollars, on account of the additional cost of living.

Mr. HOLMAN. The effect of this is to double the expenses of the Legislature.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No, sir; the saving of expense of printing, fuel, and light will more than compensate for the increase of pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean as to a single session it doubles the pay.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) authorizing the transfer of certain funds, and providing for the purchase of seeds and their distribution in the southern States; when the Speaker signed the same.

REMOVAL OF INDIAN TRIBES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 47, in relation to the removal of the Indian tribes; which was read a first and second time.

It provides that it shall not be lawful to remove or to relocate any Indian tribe not specifically authorized by law or treaty stipulation, and no public money or fund held in trust for Indians is to be used for the removal of any Indian tribe from one location to another unless specifically appropriated by law for that purpose.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to make a single remark with reference to this bill. We are in the habit of complaining, and very justly, that money is squandered in the Indian country by Indian agents and the Indian department, and I have no doubt that a great deal of money is wasted. Now here is a bill to prevent the greatest waste that ever occurs in the Indian service. I am free to say that if there is stealing in the Indian country, there is more of it done by picking up Indians and removing them from one point to another without authority of law and without treaty stipulation than in any other way, and I believe than in all other ways combined.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Is not that too strong?

Mr. WINDOM. No, sir; it is not too strong. Half a dozen Indian agents, or men in the Indian territory, get together and form a ring for the purpose of making money out of the Indians.

Mr. SCHENCK. What! Indian agents dishonest, whom you defended so strongly a short time ago?

Mr. WINDOM. No, sir; not Indian agents alone, but officers of the Army as well. They forthwith make their representations that the Indians must be removed to some other locality; and they are picked up by the Interior Department, taken off five hundred or one thousand miles, and so much per head charged for transporting and feeding them. And at the same time, in nine cases out ten, the Indians themselves walk the entire distance and cost the Government nothing at all for transportation. Not only is money squandered in this way to a very great extent, but at the same time a very great injury is done to the Indians themselves.

What does this bill propose to do? Simply this and nothing more: that hereafter these Indian tribes shall not be thus picked up at the will of a single man and removed to some other location, and the Government burdened with a vast charge for it; but before they shall be removed a treaty shall be made, or authority derived from Congress for their removal. It puts a check upon the present practice. I hope that gentlemen who are anxious, as we all are, to prevent wrong practices which have existed in the Indian country, will join with me in putting this bill upon its passage. I believe it will save hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Treasury, and at the same time be a vast benefit to the country and the Indians, too.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WINDOM. For how long?

Mr. BURLEIGH. For ten minutes.

Mr. WINDOM. I will yield for five minutes.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I believe this resolution is not what it purports to be upon its face. Its object is not to prevent the expenditure of large sums of money for the removal of Indians, but it was got up in this city in the interest of certain men who desire to obtain or to continue contracts for the supply not of Indians generally, but of Indians guilty of massacres in Minnesota and removed to Dakota Territory, and without authority of law located near our settlements, by which the Territory has been very much injured and individuals there have sustained very great losses. Now, all that I ask is that this matter may be so handled that the truth may be developed here, and that members here may understand exactly what is designed by this resolution, which has been got up in the Senate and sent over here to be carried through this House in some way or other.

Now, I am not going to allude to the different means which have been resorted to to carry this measure through here; but it involves an act of transcendent injustice to the people of Dakota, an act which will have a tendency to injure them immeasurably and to jeopardize their lives and property. If it shall be carried out it will depopulate that Territory. These Indians are those who were driven from Minnesota by the gentleman [Mr. WINDOM] and his associates. These Indians were driven into Dakota Territory, and located one hundred and fifty miles above the capital of the Territory by authority of an act of Congress, at an expense of $150,000. Then, without authority of law, they were brought down to within twenty-five miles of the capital, red-handed as they were with the blood of the people of Minnesota and the people of Dakota; and now they are sought to be kept there by this joint resolution, which was gotten up under the threats of certain men from Nebraska, and which is now attempted to be forced through here by threats of members of this House.

Now, I protest against the passage of this joint resolution as against the interests of my constituents, and as I have been directed to do by a joint resolution of the Legislature of Dakota, passed unanimously; I protest against it, because the thing is covered up with fraud and falsehood, and members here do not understand it. I had hoped I would have had time to speak at length upon this subject. But it is brought in here at the very close of the session, and there is no chance to discuss it properly. But allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this land was opened to settlement by the Government. The people of this country were invited there to establish their homes, and they went there from every State of this Union. After this has been done, after the Government has taken the money which these people have paid for their lands, the Government proposes to settle down in their midst a tribe of hostile Indians whose hands are reeking with the blood of more than a thousand innocent men, women, and children of Minnesota. And this is the measure which the gentleman from Minnesota undertakes to cover up.

I will not occupy the time of the House further than to express the hope that the House will not pass the bill at this time. If the gentleman so desires, let it be brought up at another time, when there will be more opportunity for its examination and discussion. I will move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs when appointed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make that motion without the consent of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] who holds the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not yield for that motion.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] has very kindly informed the House that there is something in this bill which is not understood; that there is a design to "cover up" something. In regard to the Indian service, no man perhaps understands better how to "cover up" than the gentleman from Dakota. So far as I am concerned I have no concealment whatever on this question. This bill is not designed to apply solely to those Indians to whom the gentleman has referred, although it is intended to embrace that tribe among others. The gentleman tells us that this bill is an outrage, a transcendent injustice to Dakota Territory. As the gentleman has talked about "covering up," I will disclose the secret of the opposition which comes from Dakota to this proposition. Four fifths of that Territory is worthless for anything on earth except to starve Indians upon. Certain men in Dakota desire to gather all the Indians they can into that Territory. That is the secret which I did "cover up" before, because I did not care to expose the gentleman. That is the only "covering up" I have done, because I did not want to make this personal allusion. All the Indians who can be brought into Dakota Territory will only add so much to the patronage there. These Indians are not now in Dakota. The gentleman, who I believe is to-day Andrew Johnson's chief fugleman here, has been figuring with him and the Secretary of the Interior to have these terrible Indians, who he claims have committed so many outrages, transferred from the Territory of Nebraska to the Territory of Dakota, simply for the reason I have mentioned. Very fearful, indeed, he must be of these Indians. Now, sir, I ask that this thing may be prevented. I ask that we may keep the control of this question.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) in reference to the payment of the salaries of members of Congress;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes;"

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 50) to furnish transportation of provisions to the destitute in the South;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 21) relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) suspending all proceedings in relation to the payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers in the military service of the United States;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) providing for the necessary survey for a ship-canal around the falls of the Ohio river for military, naval and commercial purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of John Perry; and

An act (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force in the Patent Office.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that that body had passed a bill of the House No. 79, to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes, without amendment; also, that it had passed a bill of the Senate No. 122, for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

It further informed the House that the Senate had adopted a concurrent resolution that the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses be suspended for the residue of the session.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Senate resolution for the suspension of the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses for the residue of the session will be taken up.

There was no objection, and the resolution was taken up and concurred in.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on the Union Pacific Railroad have leave to sit during the recess to take testimony and to send for persons and papers.

The motion was agreed to.

WAIT TALCOTT.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution in relation to the claim of Wait Talcott; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF INDIAN TRIBES—AGAIN.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will pass, for it is one which concerns the people of my State very nearly; otherwise I would not now trespass upon the time of the House. In 1862 the Sioux Indians of Minnesota rose against the people of that State and slaughtered over seven hundred men, women, and children. Those Indians were then removed outside the limits of Minnesota, and I understand the effort is being made to bring them back again near our western borders. Against this we naturally most earnestly protest.

Mr. BURLEIGH rose.

Mr. DONNELLY. I decline to be interrupted, as I have but a few minutes. Now, to bring the Indians who committed these murders back to Minnesota would result disastrously, not only to the people of that State, but would be a serious injury to the Indians themselves. It would arrest emigration which is now tending to our western boundary. I believe it would result in loss of life both to white men and red men.

Now, sir, this bill merely proposes that these Indians shall not be removed from their present location unless under the supervision and direction of Congress. We can certainly trust Congress in this matter; and it is altogether wrong that the interests of the growing communities on our frontier should be left to the adjustment either of individuals in the Indian Office at Washington or of Indian agents on the frontiers. If there should be any necessity for the removal of these Indians from Dakota, then let my friend submit his proposition, let the matter be discussed, and let Congress decide. I think the bill will prevent action, as I have already said, injurious to the people of Minnesota and to the Indians themselves.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I wish to say—and I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will not cut me off—that these Indians have been removed from Minnesota and have been located in close contiguity to the settled portion of Dakota. I am willing that they shall be removed as far as possible from Minnesota, but I am not willing that they shall be located within four or five miles of where I live. They have been placed there now, and in consequence my family have been driven from their home. I will do nothing to endanger the lives of the people of Minnesota, but I do insist that we should not be forced to retain these Indians in our midst when their hands are dyed with the blood of our murdered citizens.

Mr. WINDOM. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COVODE. I wish to say a word.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot yield. I would like to answer myself.

Mr. COVODE. I move to lay the bill on the table, as there seems to be some mystery about it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 36; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. COVODE and Mr. WINDOM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 41.

Mr. WINDOM. I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the joint resolution was laid on the table.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate joint resolution No. 35, to authorize the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at certain military posts; when the Speaker signed the same.

GRADING THE PUBLIC GROUNDS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 64, to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes, which had been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be reported back by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. This bill was sent to us from the Senate, where it was examined by the Committee on Finance. It ought to pass.

The bill was read. It appropriates $20,000, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, under the supervision of the architect of the Capitol extension, in grading, filling up, removing buildings, and improving the public grounds and streets around the Capitol, and provides that all the repairs and alterations of the Capitol building shall be made under the direction and supervision of the architect of the Capitol extension.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is an appropriation bill, and I raise the point of order that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering it in the House.

On the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes fifty-six.

Mr. WINDOM demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WINDOM and STEVENS, of Pennsylvania.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-six, noes not counted.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPITOL WATCHMEN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 79, to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes.

The amendment of the Senate was to add the following section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all moneys appropriated for the Washington aqueduct and for other public works of the District of Columbia shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table, but afterward withdrew it.

Mr. HOLMAN renewed the motion, but afterward withdrew it.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 86) to extend to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution that a joint committee be appointed, consisting of three members of the Senate and five members of the House, to attend the remains of Hon. GEORGE READ RIDDLE, late a member of the Senate, to his home; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House, relative to an addition to the joint rules of the two Houses, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the House No. 22, authorizing the payment of Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. WINDOM. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let it be read; the gentleman will not object to it then.

Mr. WINDOM. I object to its reading; it is not before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules in order to submit the resolution.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not in order pending the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend for the present the further execution of the order to proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move to suspend the rules, in order that I may submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the members of the Military Committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, who are re-elected to the Fortieth Congress, be instructed to prosecute during the recess the investigation into the management of the West Point Military Academy which was ordered at the late session, and which failed to be performed for lack of time; and that said committee have power to employ a clerk at the same rate as is usually paid to the clerk of the Military Committee.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me the committee might as well be appointed at once.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House. The question is upon the motion to suspend the rules, in order that the resolution may be introduced for consideration at this time.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 37, noes 47.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

The House then resumed the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

DEATH OF SENATOR RIDDLE.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a joint committee be appointed, consisting of three members of the Senate and five members of the House, to attend the remains of Hon. GEORGE READ RIDDLE, late a member of the Senate, to his home.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the resolution be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the following members as the committee on the part of the House: JOHN F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, JOHN A. NICHOLSON of Delaware, ADAM J. GLOSSBRENNER of Pennsylvania, MICHAEL C. KERR of Indiana, and JACOB BENTON of New Hampshire.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the Chair to place first on the committee the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. NICHOLSON.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair appointed the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] first on the committee because he moved a concurrence in the resolution of the Senate. But at his request the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Delaware first on the committee.

PURCHASE OF ORDNANCE, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House proposing an amendment to the joint rules of the two Houses.

The amendment was to strike out all after the concurring clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That a joint committee of six, consisting of three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives, be appointed to investigate the purchases, contracts, and experiments of the ordnance department, and that the said committee be authorized to employ a clerk and stenographer; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and that they have leave to report at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the following as the committee on the part of the House: ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, JOHN A. LOGAN of Illinois, and BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts.

PAY OF REV. C. B. BOYNTON.

The next business on the Speaker's table were the amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 22, to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOYNTON as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

After the word "appropriated" in line two insert the words "by an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.'"

Also, strike out all after the word "Congress" in line three to the end of the joint resolution, being as follows:

And that a sum sufficient to pay him the usual salary for the present fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the joint resolution be read as it will read if amended.

The joint resolution, as amended, was read at length. It authorizes Rev. CHARLES B. BOYNTON to draw the amount appropriated by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1868," for the Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIRECT TAX SALES IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 79, to confirm certain sales made by the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina to persons in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed. The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF TROOPS BY ISTHMUS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 53, relating to the transportation of troops by the Isthmus routes to the Pacific States and Territories; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask that this joint resolution be put on its passage now.

Mr. BROOKS. I would inquire of the gentleman what is the object of the bill?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let the bill be read. The bill was read at length. It provides that hereafter, whenever it shall be necessary to transport troops to the Pacific States or Territories, or to bring troops therefrom, the Secretary of War shall, for one week or more before ordering the same to be done, advertise in at least one newspaper at New York or at San Francisco, as the case may be, for such transportation; and he shall contract with such person or persons as shall give sufficient security for the most rapid and safe conveyance of said troops and at the lowest cost to the Government, the Secretary being at liberty to reject all bids if he shall believe the public interest will be promoted thereby.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The circumstances that gave rise to this joint resolution I suppose are well known to members. Not long since some troops being sent across the Isthmus by the Nicaraguan route were delayed and the cholera broke out among them, and some thirty or forty soldiers and two officers fell victims to that disease. This joint resolution is to enable the Secretary of War to take measures against any such delay in the future.

Mr. BROOKS. Suppose an emergency should arise when a week cannot be taken to advertise for proposals for transportation, a telegram is received in the morning for troops to leave that day; what would be done in that case?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, Mr. Speaker, I suppose they might provide for that emergency under the war power. I do not, however, apprehend that there will arise very soon any such emergency requiring the immediate transportation of troops from the Atlantic to the Pacific or vice versa. I think the bill is a very good one.

Mr. BROOKS. I dare say the bill may be all right; but we do not know anything about it. I think it ought to be referred. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will yield for that motion. I am willing that the sense of the House shall be taken upon it. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was first upon the motion of Mr. BROOKS, that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

On the motion there were—ayes 41, noes 44.

Mr. BROOKS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs FARNSWORTH and BROOKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-two.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not insist upon a further count.

So the motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 122) entitled "An act for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District of Columbia;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that this bill will be put upon its passage.

The bill, which was read, proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the support of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District of Columbia, organized under an act of July 25, 1866, and an amendatory act of February 22, 1867; the money to be expended under the direction of the officers of the institution.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 64) to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes; and

An act (S. No. 114) amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES IN NEBRASKA.

The last business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 86) entitled "An act extending to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the grant made by the law of July 2, 1862, to each State of land equal to thirty thousand acres for each of its Senators and Representatives in Congress, for the purpose of establishing agricultural colleges, be extended to the State of Nebraska in the same manner as if Nebraska had been a State of the Union at the date of the passage of the law.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAPER FOR CONGRESSIONAL PRINTING.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution, to which I think there can be no objection. If there should be, I will move that the rules be suspended to allow its introduction.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the Congressional Printer upon the purchases of paper be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing, with power to investigate the same, to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the recess.

Mr. HOLMAN.* I trust the last clause of that resolution will be stricken out. Otherwise, it is unexceptionable. Authorizing the committee to sit during the vacation is unnecessary.

Mr. LAFLIN. It is necessary in order that the $100,000 held back from the contractors for paper may be paid. It is agreeable to the late Superintendent of Public Printing. It is his particular wish that this investigation should take place.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the same investigation has been set on foot at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. LAFLIN. It was reported to this House, and has nothing to do with the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is there any committee that has not authority to sit during the recess? I think there is not, and this committee would be lonesome unless this authority is granted to them.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Mileage has not authority to sit during the recess.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. We have five minutes left, and I think that is sufficient for the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The rules have not yet been suspended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that this committee is now authorized to sit during the recess. By the concurrent resolution of the two Houses this session of the Fortieth Congress continues to the first Wednesday in July next, at which time, unless a quorum appears, there is to be an adjournment sine die.

Mr. LAFLIN. Under that decision of the Chair I am willing to accept the modification. The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House joint resolution No. 22, to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOXTON as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress; when the Speaker signed the same.

NEW POST ROUTES.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish certain post routes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill establishes post routes from Kennebunk to Cape Neddick, and from Biddeford to Saco Pool, in the State of Maine.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, one of his Clerks, notifying the House that he had this day approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the iron-clad monitor Comanche; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 7) providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States."

The latter joint resolution was accompanied with the following message:

To the House of Representatives:

In giving my approval to the joint resolution providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," I am moved to do so for the following reason: the seventh section of the act supplementary to the act for the more efficient government of the rebel States provides that the expenses incurred under or by virtue of that act shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This provision is wholly unlimited as to the amount to be expended, whereas the resolution now before me limits the appropriation to $500,000. I consider this limitation as a very necessary check against unlimited expenditure and liabilities. Yielding to that consideration, I feel bound to approve this resolution without modifying in any manner any objections heretofore stated against the original and supplemental acts.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 30, 1867.

The message was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Norman Wiard, relating to steel guns, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Ordnance.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. WARD moved as an amendment that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon the motion to refer, as amended.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope it will be voted down.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 44, noes 38.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SCHENCK called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. WARD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 44.

So the motion, as amended, was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move as an original motion to refer it to the joint select Committee on Ordnance.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The latter motion has priority.

On referring the resolution to the Committee of the Whole, there were—ayes 81, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WINDOM and SCHENCK.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85; noes 47.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative, making a quorum.

Mr. WINDOM. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Have I the privilege of withdrawing the resolution? If so I will do it.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection it will be withdrawn.

No objection was made, and the resolution was accordingly withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution that a committee consisting of two members be appointed on the part of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make the two Houses, having finished the business before them, were ready to adjourn, and had ordered that Mr. MORGAN and Mr. HENDRICKS be the committee on the part of the Senate.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the House concur in the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. WINDOM and BROOKS as the committee on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM desired to be excused; and the Speaker appointed in his place Mr. LAFLIN.

LIGHTING WASHINGTON WITH GAS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is an important joint resolution on the Speaker's table in reference to lighting this city with gas. Unless it receives the concurrence of the House we shall leave the city in darkness, which is much to be dreaded. It will take but a moment to pass it, and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. I object.

TESTING OF ORDNANCE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution in relation to experiments of testing ordnance for the purpose of reference to the joint Committee on Ordnance.

Mr. ROSS. I object. It is too late in the session for experiments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. CHANLER. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read the resolution partially, as follows:

Resolved, That the Ordnance Committee be directed to determine upon a proper series of experiments to be applied to guns offered for service, and upon rules to govern the ordnance department in making purchases of heavy ordnance, the tests to determine the rate of hitting and missing of shots from heavy guns when fired at moving objects, the penetration of shots from such guns in earth, brick, stone—

The reading of the resolution was not concluded.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 86) extending to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges; and

An act (S. No. 122) for the support in part of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, in the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, informed the House that he had this day approved and signed a bill and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 79) to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 22) to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOXTON, Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the committee to wait on the President, reported that the committee had discharged that duty, and had been directed by the President to inform the House that he had no further business to communicate to them.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen, the hour of twelve o'clock m. having arrived, I do, in accordance with the concurrent resolution adopted by both Houses, and wishing each one of you a safe journey to your respective homes, and a happy reunion with your families and friends, declare the first session of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress adjourned to the first Wednesday, at noon, in July next.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 3, 1867.

In pursuance of the provisions of the resolution of adjournment passed by Congress on the 29th of March last, the Senate reassembled in the Senate Chamber, in the city of Washington, this day, at twelve o'clock noon.

Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate for the Thirty-Ninth Congress, offered the following prayer:

Blessing and honor and glory and might and dominion be unto God, our Creator, Sovereign Ruler, everlasting Redeemer, enthroned in the Heavens. Thanks be to Thy great name for Thy presence and the fullness of Thy blessings vouchsafed to our beloved nation. Thanks for the peace now prevailing in our borders and the prosperity within our palaces. Thanks for all the manifestations of Thy goodness and mercy which, from day to day, we enjoy. Thanks for the health prevailing in our land, for the goodness restraining the hand of the destroying angel from raining down pestilence upon our cities and upon our towns. Thanks for the blessings of health, for blessings individual, collective, national. May we receive them as coming from Thy hand, and acknowledge them with devout gratitude and praise. Oh God, it is with shame and confusion of face that we come to confess our sins individually, socially, nationally. Forgive them; blot out our transgressions, and grant that we may stand up before Thee a regenerated and saved people. Especially do we now invoke Thy blessing to be upon Thy servants convened within these Halls of legislation. We ask that Thou wilt give wisdom to the Senators and to the Representatives, and grace to the officers presiding over both Houses, and let dignity and a spirit of kindness and wisdom and truth and justice characterize all their deliberations, and let Thy blessing be upon all the members of this Congress, and upon all of their enactments. Bless the President of the United States and those associated with him in authority, and give them wisdom and grace to administer the laws of the land in such a manner as to secure harmony, union, self-respect among the different classes of the community in this great commonwealth of States; and thus may the blessing of God, the great superintending intelligence of the universe, be upon us in all of our interests and institutions, making us, as a nation, an honor to ourselves and a glory to the world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE, President pro tempore of the Senate, resumed the chair and said: The time having arrived for the commencement of the adjourned session of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, the Senate will please come to order, and the Clerk will read the resolution under which the Senate has assembled.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby directed to adjourn their respective Houses on Saturday, March 30, 1867, at twelve o'clock, meridian, to the first Wednesday in July, 1867, at noon, when the roll of each House shall be immediately called, and immediately thereafter the Presiding Officer of each House shall cause the Presiding Officer of the other House to be informed whether or not a quorum of its body has appeared; and thereupon, if a quorum of the two Houses respectively shall not have appeared upon such call of the rolls, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall immediately adjourn their respective Houses without day.

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order on that resolution, which I submit as follows: that the resolution under which Congress is to-day assembled, so far as it undertakes to direct the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress without day, is unconstitutional and inoperative, inasmuch as the Constitution, after declaring that "a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business," proceeds to provide that "a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members;" and therefore such resolution must not be regarded by the Chair so far as it undertakes to provide for an adjournment without day. As, according to the view, there is a quorum already present, the incident contemplated by the resolution will not probably arise; but I felt it my duty, by way of precaution and caveat to introduce now this protest, to the end that that resolution may not hereafter be drawn into a precedent so as to abridge the rights of the two Houses of Congress under the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks perhaps the motion is premature. At present we do not know judicially whether there is a quorum present or not to do anything, even to act upon the question of order.

Mr. SUMNER. I have already said that I now present this in the way of protest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does not contemplate action upon it?

Mr. SUMNER. Not now.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the roll may be called to ascertain whether we have a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll of the Senate according to the resolution, and the Senators will answer to their names as called.

The Chief Clerk thereupon proceeded to call the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—35.

The following Senators were absent:

Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The first business in order will be to inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate has assembled.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that a committee be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The usual practice is for the Secretary to do that.

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution of adjournment requires that to be done by the presiding officers. It does not require any motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HOWARD. I will inquire whether a resolution would be in order at this moment?

Mr. SUMNER. Petitions and reports are first in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are not yet organized.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask whether it would be proper to proceed to the transaction of any business or to entertain even a petition or resolution before we have received a message from the House of Representatives announcing that they have a quorum present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose not. I suppose that that is the first thing to be done. There will be no Congress unless there is a quorum of the House also.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Lest the protest of the Senator from Massachusetts should by silence be supposed by some to be acquiesced in, I wish to state that I protest against his protest as utterly out of place. I believe it is competent for the two Houses under the Constitution to regulate their own adjournments; and the Senator might as well have introduced a resolution that the Senate at three or four o'clock to-day could not adjourn over until to-morrow because less than a quorum could sit here and compel the residue of the members to come in, as to present the proposition that he has, in my judgment. I do not wish to discuss it, but merely to enter a protest against any such construction of the Constitution as denies to the two Houses of Congress the right to regulate their own adjournments.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, there is an actual text of the Constitution which even the learning and ingenuity of my friend from Illinois cannot displace. Here it is in so many words:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide."

Now, here is a concurrent resolution providing for a future meeting of Congress. To that extent it is unquestionably constitutional; but when the resolution goes forward and imposes shackles upon the two Houses of Congress when they shall come together by virtue of that resolution, then I submit it does what, under the Constitution, it cannot do; its words are powerless. Congress, when once assembled by virtue of that resolution, has all the powers of a Congress of the United States under the Constitution. That resolution cannot restrain it. Such, at any rate, is my conclusion, after the best reflection that I have been able to give to these words of the Constitution; and I feel it my duty on this occasion to make this protest, to the end that what we now do may not be drawn into an example hereafter. It is well known that those words were introduced in order to tie the hands of the Congress should it come together and there be no quorum present; in short, to despoil the Congress then assembled of the prerogative secured to it by the Constitution of the United States. To that extent I insist that the resolution hereafter shall be regarded as of no value, and not be quoted as a precedent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest to my mind that the constitutional clause to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers has no application whatever to a case of this kind. A smaller number than a majority, or a smaller number than a quorum, "may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members." How must they be "authorized?" By a majority, by an act of Congress, or by a resolution of the body itself. So far from a minority being authorized, a minority are expressly forbidden by this rule to compel the attendance of members. A minority cannot, against the voice of the majority, against the regulation of the majority, compel the attendance of members. That is what the Constitution means. It means that the minority, acting in obedience to the authority conferred by the majority, may do it. Now, the majority have not authorized it. This clause was inserted in the Constitution for the purpose of authorizing a minority, under a regulation to be prescribed by the majority, to compel the attendance of a majority. It can only be done in case it is authorized. Each House may authorize a minority in such manner and under such penalties as it thinks proper to compel the attendance of the others. Now, each House, or rather the Senate in which we are sitting, has not authorized the minority to compel the attendance of absent members at this session, but has forbidden it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Congress has forbidden it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Both Houses have forbidden it, and as the greater includes the less each House has forbidden it. This clause was inserted for the purpose of enabling a minority at the time when Congress was first to assemble, under such directions as might be prescribed by the law-making power or by each House, to compel the attendance of a quorum. That is all that it means. I do not know that the Senate has prescribed the mode by which this may be done. If it has done so at any time; the last rule at any rate would obtain, which is a rule prohibiting the compelling of the attendance of members on the present occasion in case a quorum is not present. But there is no importance in this question; a quorum is here in compliance with the resolution; and I only rose to enter my dissent from this formal protest of the Senator from Massachusetts.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed to inform the Senate that the Speaker of the House of Representatives having caused the roll of members to be called, as provided for in the concurrent resolution of the two Houses of the 29th of March, it appears that a quorum of the House of Representatives is present.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill with a view to reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to its present introduction?

Mr. ANTHONY. With the assent of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will offer a resolution first.

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. ANTHONY. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be taken to be the sense of the Senate if there be no objection, and the Chair will appoint Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. BUCKALEW as the committee on the part of the Senate.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. ANTHONY. With the assent of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will offer another resolution:

Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock m., until otherwise ordered.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SUMNER. Are not petitions first in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose they would be in order. It would be more regular perhaps to have the regular organization before we proceed to business. We have to send a notice to the President, I suppose.

Mr. SUMNER. But I ask the Chair if the organization is not completed? The committees are already appointed, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose petitions are in order.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of J. A. Maxwell, of Mississippi, in which he asks to be relieved from certain civil disabilities on account of having been compromised in the rebellion. He is represented to me by a person who knows him well as having always been opposed to the rebellion. He held the office of probate judge of Claiborne county, in Mississippi, at the time of the rebellion in the State, and continued to hold it for some time after that, and did nothing more.

I also offer the petition of W. W. Handlin, who asks to be relieved from civil disabilities. He is represented as an attorney-at-law in New Orleans, where he lived at the breaking out of the rebellion, to which he was opposed. He was a member of the local militia and captain of a company, but never in service. He is represented as a gentleman of integrity and learning, and worthy of relief.

I offer these two petitions, and ask their reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. In offering them I desire to say that I express no opinion myself with regard to the policy of Congress undertaking to provide for special cases, even as meritorious as I doubt not these are. It is with me a serious question whether it is not for the interest of the Union people in those States that persons, even such as these, should continue under their present disabilities rather than that Congress should interfere in any way with that important legislation. I merely make this remark—I feel it my duty to do it—because I have been called to present these petitions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I have got some more petitions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to interpose an objection to the reference of these petitions, and I may as well bring the question up here now before the Senator offers any more. I do it for the reason that in my judgment it is not expedient at the present session to act upon general business. As we all know, we come together under very peculiar circumstances, and probably in the minds of most gentlemen with reference to a particular question. I remember that at the called session of the Twenty-Seventh Congress by General Harrison there were several propositions made with reference to the disposition of business, and I have been looking at the record this morning to see what was done. I had an imperfect recollection with regard to it. I remembered being on a committee (I believe it was an informal committee) of one from each State (I was a member of the House at that time) to advise the House with reference to the business to be done at that session. In consequence of the deliberations of that committee thus raised by the House, a change of the rule, limited to the session, was adopted by the House. I have been looking at it this morning, and it is substantially this: that to the reception of all papers upon all subjects not referred to in the President's message to Congress, with the single exception of a national bankrupt law, an objection should be considered as made, and that they should be laid upon the table without debate. That rule was adopted by the House, and it was adhered to. At that session we did nothing, if I recollect aright, except to discuss and act upon the subjects referred to in the message of the President and the bankrupt bill.

Now, sir, we meet here in the month of July. I presume I cannot be mistaken in saying that it was the general sentiment—there might have been exceptions, and probably were—of the members of the House and of the members of the Senate, when we adopted the resolution under which we adjourned, that unless something occurred to render it necessary, in the judgment of members, there probably would be no quorum present in either House at this session. Something has occurred which has excited a general feeling throughout the country that there ought to be a session, and that is a single matter which calls us together. For myself I am not prepared to say that there is anything else which requires our attention at the present time. Especially do I deem it not advisable to proceed to the consideration of general business, to refer petitions to committees, to introduce bills and have those referred to committees and reported upon at this session; but that all those matters of general legislation should be laid upon the table, if presented, for the present, at least until the two Houses have had a little time to deliberate and settle the question whether or not they will go into the consideration of business of all kinds, and if not, what particular business they will take up.

I therefore object to the reference of those petitions presented by the Senator, and I would move to lay them on the table, but that, I suppose, in the nature of the motion itself, would preclude other gentlemen from expressing their opinions on the subject. Perhaps the opinion of the Senate for the present, for the day, until we may deliberate further on the subject and come to some conclusion among ourselves, may be as well settled upon the question of the reference of those petitions or of any bills that may be offered, such as that offered by my friend on my right, [Mr. Wilson,] as in any other way. I therefore make that objection, having stated the grounds upon which I make it and the views which I entertain with regard to the propriety of proceeding in the ordinary way to the reference of bills and petitions and other matters, until we have come to some more definite conclusion on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, we are a Congress of the United States assembled under the Constitution, and with all the powers that belong to the body under the Constitution; ay, sir, and with all the responsibilities which belong to Congress under the Constitution. We cannot by an agreement or understanding with ourselves divest ourselves of our responsibilities. What are they? To transact the public business, not simply one matter or two matters, but the public business in its sum total, whatever that may be—all that concerns the welfare of this great Republic. Now, the Senator from Maine limits us to one matter, which he has only alluded to, but has not undertaken to characterize. I suppose that I understand him; but he must know well that even that matter to which he refers, as I suppose, has many ramifications. But why are we to be restrained to that one matter? I see no reason. There is nothing in the past usage of this body that should control us in that regard; nor is there anything in the present necessities. Looking at the past usage of Congress, I need not remind you that we have habitually sat throughout the summer into the month of August—ay, and on one occasion into the month of September. It is no new thing that Congress should be here in July. It is an exception that Congress is not here in July during what is called the long session. Therefore, in considering public business, even in these heats, we are only doing what our predecessors before us have done; we are following the usage of Congress, and not setting up a new usage of our own. The motion of the Senator, if it be a motion, or rather his suggestion, does set up a new usage. It is virtually to declare that when admonished by the heats of July we will fold our hands, and will not even consider public business except in one particular case; that all the other vast interests of this country will be left, without any reference to a committee, without any inquiry, unattended to, neglected. Now, there are other interests that require attention, and since Congress is together I submit that we ought not to fail in that, too.

The Senator from Maine says that when Congress adjourned it was not supposed that there would be a session at this time. He may not have supposed there would be a session. I never doubted that there would be a session. I saw full well that the public interests would require a session of Congress in the month of July, and I labored to bring it about, feeling that in so doing I was only discharging a public duty. Why, do you forget whom you have as President? A constant disturber, a mischief-maker. So long as his administration continues it is the duty of Congress to be on guard, perpetually on watch against him as a disturber of the public peace and the public security; and that must have been obvious when Congress adjourned, as it is obvious now. Senators may not have foreseen precisely what he would do; but I take it that there were few Senators who did not foresee that he would do something that would make it important for Congress to be present. For myself I did not doubt then that it would be our duty to be here in our places in order to make adequate provision against his misdeeds. He is President and the head of the executive, invested with all the power that belongs to that department of Government. It is hard, I know, for you to provide against him; but nevertheless you must do it. This Republic is too great, too vast, and too precious to be left in the hands of a bad man.

One of the greatest masters in the art of war tells us as the lesson of his great military experience that the good general always regards that as probable which is possible. I know no better rule for the statesman than to regard that as probable which is possible. Now, with a President such as we have, anything in the nature of disturbance or interference with the public security is possible through the exercise of the executive arm. Therefore you are to regard it as probable and make provision against it. So I argued with myself last spring and was satisfied that it would be our duty to be in our seats at the coming July. We are now here, and I now insist that it is our duty to go forward and discharge all our duties, without any exception, under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Senator has laid down two propositions as the foundation of his remarks with which I do not feel disposed to differ. One is, that we are in session as a Congress and have the power to do all kinds of business. That I agree to. Another is, that we are acting under the responsibilities of a Congress. That I agree to. The question is simply what each Senator will consider to be his responsibility, or rather what that sense of responsibility will in his judgment render it necessary that he should act upon. That is for each Senator to determine for himself; and although we all have not the powers of prophecy which my honorable friend from Massachusetts has, to tell exactly what ought to be done always and the way to do it, yet we each, I suppose, have individual opinions and are not only ready but able to act upon those opinions for ourselves.

The Senator says this is according to usage. I beg leave to differ with him. I know the business of Congress has led us at the long session into the month of July. It did last year. At the short session never, because the Congress expires in March, and we never have had a session under these circumstances before. It is a new thing, entirely without precedent, without example; and the Senator can point me to no precedent. There has been no other session of Congress in the summer, in the vacation between the adjournment in March, the expiration of one Congress, and the meeting of the next in December, except when a special session was called by the President himself. So much for the usage.

Now, sir, to show that I am not very much out of the way, and to fortify myself by the opinions of others, I refer to the proceedings of the Twenty-Seventh Congress. I find that in the Senate—

"Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, as the opinion of the Senate, That at the present session of Congress no business ought to be transacted but such, as being of an important or urgent nature, may be supposed to have influenced the extraordinary convention of Congress, or such as that the postponement of it might be materially detrimental to the public interests.

Resolved, therefore, as the opinion of the Senate, That the following subjects ought first, if not exclusively, to engage the deliberations of Congress at the present session, namely:

- "1. The repeal of the sub-Treasury.
- "2. The incorporation of a bank adapted to the wants of the people and of the Government.
- "3. The provision of an adequate revenue for the Government by the imposition of duties, and including an authority to contract a temporary loan to cover the public debt created by the last Administration.
- "4. The prospective distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.
- "5. The passage of necessary appropriation bills; and—
- "6. Some modification of the banking system of the District of Columbia, for the benefit of the people of the District.

Resolved, That it is expedient to distribute the business proper to be done at this session between the Senate and House of Representatives, so as to avoid both Houses acting on the same subject at the same time."—Senate Journal, Twenty-Seventh Congress, First Session, page 24.

That resolution was not acted upon; it was displaced by the course adopted by the House of Representatives. The House adopted, under the circumstances to which I have referred, a change of rules. I will now read, so that there may be no mistake about it, the rule then adopted:

"Upon the presentation of petitions and other papers, on subjects not specially referred to the consideration of the House in the message of the President at the opening of the present extra session, objection to the reception shall be considered as made, and the question of reception shall be laid on the table. This rule to be considered only in force during the present session. Petitions and other papers for or against a bankrupt law to be excepted from the operation of this rule. The action of all committees, on all subjects not specially referred to the consideration of the House in the message of the President, shall be suspended during the present session; this suspension not to apply to the business before the Committees of Elections, of Ways and Means, of Accounts, and on Mileage, nor, if the House shall so determine, to the subject of a general bankrupt law."—Journal House of Representatives, Twenty-Seventh Congress, First Session, page 117.

Now, sir, the proposition that I make is not one that calls for any definite action at the present time. I am not wise enough. I am not enough of a prophet at once to tell what may be necessary. The only proposition that I make is that for a day or two, for a short period, action referring petitions and referring bills may be suspended until the members of the Senate have an opportunity to consider what is best to be done at the present session, and decide definitely upon it. Their conclusion may cover all that the Senator speaks of.

I do not see, however, that his argument with reference to the President has any relation whatever to the proposition that I make, if it may be called a proposition, or rather the suggestion that I make, because if anything of that sort is necessary it will be included unquestionably by the members of the Senate and of the other House in the conclusion they may come to or the resolution that they may entertain and adopt fixing what business shall be done, and excluding that which is not particularly called for by any pressure of the public interest at the present time.

Why sir, take as an illustration: the Senator has presented two petitions, and he says that he has not made up his mind whether any action ought to be had upon them. Is that the kind of pressure of public business that he wants to attend to and regard and respect at the present time? My own impression I gave, that we really come together for a special purpose, and when that special purpose is accomplished all other business may as well go over to a period of a year when we can attend to it without inconvenience and without damage to ourselves. So far as I have conversed with gentlemen, and I have conversed with a great many, I believe it to be the general sentiment and feeling of the country that we should have as short a session as possible, and do only that which is absolutely to be done. What that may include is for the Senate and for the House of Representatives to determine. It may include all that the honorable Senator suggests, or it may not. What I ask is simply that the two bodies have an opportunity, before proceeding to initiate business by the reference of bills, &c., to consider and decide that question, and when the majority has decided it I certainly shall acquiesce in the decision. I do not feel disposed now to go into any general considerations arising from the danger supposed to be apprehended from the President or from any other source in relation to that, but simply to take what seemed to me a very plain and sensible course of proceeding.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will pardon me if I add one word to what I have already said. The Senator from Maine introduces as a precedent something which he will pardon me if I say is not a precedent. He calls our attention to a session of Congress convened by virtue of a summons of the President of the United States—a called session of Congress. Why, sir, this is no called session of Congress. This is simply a continuing session of one that was begun on the 4th day of March. It is not a new session. It is a session already begun, prolonged now in the midst of July. Had it been such a session as the Senator from Maine seems to have imagined his precedent would be applicable. We might then have searched the message of the President in order to find the subjects proper for consideration. It is, however, no such session. We are here broadly, under all our powers as a Congress, and our life as a Congress, having begun here on the 4th day of March, at noon. Therefore, allow me say, the precedent is inapplicable. At any rate so it seems to me, and I submit to the Senate if I am not right in that conclusion.

The practical question then is, what shall we do, being a Congress assembled as any other Congress, with all powers and all duties? I submit, proceed with the public business in due order until such time as by the reports of committees or by votes of the bodies we shall be satisfied that it is not advisable to proceed further with the matters so referred. I think, therefore, petitions should be presented and referred, bills introduced and take their proper destinations, and business of all kinds be brought before the Senate. Then afterward it will be well for the Senate to determine what course to take in regard to it. I hope these petitions will be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts whether it would not be best, under the circumstances, to allow his petitions to lie upon the table until the two Houses can resolve upon something definite, whether they will proceed to the business of general legislation or whether they will confine themselves to those matters which all believe to be of first importance.

Mr. SUMNER. But I ask my friend how we are to know that?

Mr. HOWARD. Let your petitions be laid on the table temporarily.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it not the most practicable course to let petitions and all other business take the ordinary direction? I feel that if we make an exception we depart from the rule; the business is not as it ought to be, is not in proper order. In presenting the petitions as I have, I have simply followed the rules of the Senate. I have other petitions of a different character, coming from southern States, which I desire to present, and I also have other matters which I hope to submit to the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely make the suggestion to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether that would not be the better course to take for the present until the two Houses of Congress can consider this whole matter and dispose of it themselves. It is my opinion, speaking for myself, that there will not be found a majority of the two Houses who are willing to protract this session of Congress for any great length of time. I think the general disposition will be found to be that we had better confine ourselves to the matter of reconstruction and to the various subjects necessarily connected with that most important of all the subjects that we have had before us, and not to go beyond that line of demarcation. I am willing for one to refer that question entirely to the good sense of the two Houses, and I do not set up my opinion as being more valuable than that of the two Houses. It seems to me I would let these petitions lie on the table for the present until we know what we shall do.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I have no objection. Then let them lie on the table, and I give notice that when the Senate shows a disposition to proceed with business, I will call them up and have them referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will lie on the table by general consent, no objection being made.

Mr. SUMNER. I now offer the petition of J. H. Heald, of New Orleans, asking for relief from a decree of forfeiture in a cotton case. According to the suggestion of my friend, I ask that that lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of L. J. Allain, of Louisiana, setting forth an important discovery with regard to the culture of sugar-cane, for which he can obtain no adequate protection by the existing patent laws; and he asks for legislation for his benefit on that account. I should prefer that the petition in the usual course of business should go to the Committee on Patents, but I now ask that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, there being no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President, and had appointed Mr. JOHN F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, Mr. RUFUS P. SPALDING of Ohio, and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD of New York, the committee on the part of the House.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER. Is the introduction of bills in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WILSON. I presented a bill some time since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] asks leave to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent leave was given to introduce a bill (S. No. 123) in addition to the act passed March 2, 1867, to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and the act supplementary thereto, passed March 23, 1867; and it was read the first time by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better be laid on the table for the present.

Mr. WILSON. It is a bill in regard to the very subject that has brought us here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The objection is merely to deciding in advance. We all understand that perfectly well.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to its taking that course. I will merely say that it is a simple bill of a few sections in regard to this very subject which has called us together.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is undoubtedly the subject on which we shall act; but I propose that the bill lie on the table for the present, merely to carry out the idea which has been suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on laying this bill on the table for the present. Is there any objection to that order? No objection being made, the bill will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. WILSON. And let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask leave to introduce a bill without previous notice, it being substantially a bill introduced at the last session, but with certain amendments, which I have introduced at the suggestion of gentlemen of Maryland, and in order to meet the circumstances of that particular State. It is a bill entitled as follows: "A bill to enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens." I ask leave to introduce this bill, and propose that it be printed and laid on the table.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce the bill (S. No. 124;) which was read the first time, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 125) in explanation of an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867; which was read the first time by its title, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DRAKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 126) further to provide for the reconstruction of the rebel States; which was read the first time by its title, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I ask leave to introduce two bills, to correct a clerical error that we fell into at the last session. I shall call them up to-morrow. There is no necessity for their reference. At present I ask that the bills lie upon the table.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 127) to repeal an act entitled "An act for the relief of Matilda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon," approved January 31, 1867, and a bill (S. No. 128) for the relief of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon; which were read the first time by their titles, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 129) further supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867; which was read the first time by its title, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock on Friday.

The motion was agreed to.

HOMESTEADS FOR FREEDMEN.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the reconstruction of the rebel States would be hastened and the best interest of the country promoted if the President of the United States, in the exercise of the pardoning power, would require that every landed proprietor who has been engaged in the rebellion, before receiving his pardon therefor, should convey to the freedmen, his former slaves, a certain portion of the land on which they have worked, so that they may have a homestead in which their own labor has mingled, and that the disloyal master may not continue to appropriate to himself the fruits of their toil.

I move that the resolution be printed and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

INSTRUCTIONS TO MILITARY COMMANDERS.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer a resolution on which I wish the action of the Senate at present:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to communicate to the Senate copies of all orders, instructions, circular letters, or letters of advice issued to the respective military officers assigned to the command of the several military districts under the act passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the act supplementary thereto, passed March 23, 1867; also copies of all opinions given to him by the Attorney General of the United States touching the construction and interpretation of said acts, and of all correspondence relating to the operation, construction, or execution of said acts that may have taken place between himself and any of said commanders, or between him and the General of the Army, or between the latter and any of the said commanders touching the same subjects; also, copies of all orders issued by any of said commanders in carrying out the provisions of said acts, or either of them; also, that he inform the Senate what progress has been made in the matter of registration under said acts, and whether the sum of money heretofore appropriated for carrying them out is probably sufficient.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all the official correspondence between the Department of State and Hon. Lewis D. Campbell, late minister of the United States to the republic of Mexico, from the time of his appointment; also the correspondence of the Department with his successor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that resolution had better go over. I prefer that it should go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair a resolution which covers in part the ground of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Michigan, to which I think there will be no objection:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the Senate copies of any correspondence on the files of the Department of State relating to any recent events in Mexico.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I prefer that should go over.

Mr. SUMNER. It is merely to get information.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly, and it may all be very proper; but under the idea on which we have acted so far, I prefer that it should go over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If one passes, both should pass.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly. I shall withdraw my objection to the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan if this pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think nothing can be lost by letting it go over until Friday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over under the rule.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions on the table introduced by me on the 7th of March.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions declaring certain further guarantees required in the reconstruction of the rebel States.

1. Resolved, That Congress, in declaring by positive legislation that it possesses paramount authority over the rebel States, and in prescribing that no person therein shall be excluded from the elective franchise by reason of race, color, or previous condition, has begun the work of reconstruction, and has set an example to itself.

2. Resolved, That there are other things remaining to be done which are as clearly within the power of Congress as the elective franchise, and it is the duty of Congress to see that these things are not left undone.

3. Resolved, That among the things remaining to be done are the following:

First, The existing governments, which have been declared to be illegal, must be vacated, so that they can have no agency in the work of reconstruction, and will cease to exercise a pernicious influence.

Secondly, Provisional governments must be constituted as temporary substitutes for the illegal governments, with special authority to superintend the transition to permanent governments, republican in form.

Thirdly, As loyalty, beyond suspicion, must be the basis of permanent government republican in form, every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments.

Fourthly, As the education of the people is essential to the national welfare, and especially to the development of those principles of justice and morality which constitute the foundation of republican government, and as, according to the census, an immense proportion of the people in the rebel States, without distinction of color, cannot read and write, therefore public schools must be established for the equal good of all.

Fifthly, Not less important than education is the homestead, which must be secured to the freedmen, so that at least every head of a family may have a piece of land.

4. Resolved, That all these requirements are in the nature of guarantees to be exacted by Congress, without which the United States will not obtain that security for the future which is essential to a just reconstruction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those resolutions involve a great variety of subjects, and I really do not see the propriety of taking them up to-day at our first meeting. If the Senator merely desires to have them printed for the information of the Senate—

Mr. SUMNER. They are printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, it is a matter requiring a great deal of investigation, and involves the very question we have had up with regard to the business of the session. The Senator, it seems, is not willing to wait even a day or two for any consideration or consultation on the subject, but wishes to take up these resolutions immediately. I have expressed my opinion on the subject. I object to taking them up for consideration; and it may be as well, if the Senator insists upon it, to have the question settled whether we will proceed to the consideration of all these subjects to-day, and I shall therefore call for the yeas and nays upon the question of taking up the resolutions for consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend from Maine is very critical. When I introduce petitions that concern matters outside of reconstruction he objects to their consideration because they do not concern reconstruction; and now, when I ask the Senate to proceed with resolutions which have been months on your table, and which concern reconstruction and nothing else, he objects to their consideration. Now I do not think that we can do better to-day, on this first day of our assembly, than to consider briefly the general principles which should enter into our provisions.

All agree that we are to provide a new measure of reconstruction. The question is, to what extent it shall go; what principles shall it recognize? The resolutions on your table declare the extent to which we should go and the principles which we should recognize. Had the bill already passed embodied those principles possibly there would have been no occasion for our session now, though, as I have already said, considering the character of our Chief Magistrate, that is very doubtful. But by these resolutions it is declared that the existing governments must be vacated. Now, sir, I ask to have these resolutions considered that I may here, on this first day of the session, declare my conviction that we can make no progress in this question until the existing governments have been vacated. You have by your act of reconstruction declared that they are not legal, and yet, you leave them in a certain sense still existing. You must go forward and absolutely vacate them, so that they may not be in the way of a just reconstruction.

The resolutions then declare that there must be provisional governments as a substitute for those already vacated. That is an obvious proposition. I will not discuss it.

They then proceed to say that "every possible precaution must be adopted against rebel agency or influence in the formation of these governments." Is not that true? Can any one doubt that that must be accomplished?

They then proceed to declare that education must be required as a condition of reconstruction. Can any one doubt the importance of that? I am told sometimes that whether we require it or not, such is the mood of the South now that education will enter into every measure of reconstruction. That, sir, does not supersede the duty on our part. We must go forward and specially require it.

The resolutions then declare further that we must see in some way that every freedman is provided with a homestead. I have already in another resolution, which is on your table, declared that one practical way of bringing that about would be through the pardoning power of the President of the United States. Had the President begun right, and in granting a pardon to the landed proprietors required as a condition that they should all have set apart a piece of land for their freedmen, you would have had a new element of reconstruction and a new security for peace. I regret more than I can say the loss the country has suffered through that failure on the part of the President. Congress, I know, cannot control the pardoning power; but it may express its opinion with regard to its exercise; it may express its desires. Still further, Congress may, through the forfeited estates for non-payment of taxation, or in some other way, make provision to this end. My single object in that regard is to bring about, in some way or other, by some means the possession of a homestead for every head of a family among the freedmen. I believe that we shall not accomplish a just reconstruction until that enters as one of the conditions.

I am willing to be taught by a very great experience on this subject: I refer to that of Russia. Senators perhaps are not aware that the question of emancipation in Russia halted for some time on the single question of whether the emancipated serf should be allowed his freehold. At last, when that question was settled, the whole question was practically settled, and emancipation there became an assured success. Until the freehold was secured to the serf it was felt that he was not secured in his liberty; and I fear that until we secure to our emancipated bondmen a foothold in the soil, they will not be secured in those just rights which they have a right to expect from this Republic. It is from the United States that they have received the great boon of emancipation, and the United States must see to it that emancipation is practically carried to its beneficent consummation by providing a freehold.

I do not here intend to open the great and delicate question of confiscation, though should that come under discussion I should have no hesitation to meet it; but I content myself with a simpler proposition, beneficent in its character, and having in it no element of punishment; not punitive in its character, but essentially conservative, seeking future peace and security for this Republic. I insist that in some way, in laying the foundations of reconstruction, you must provide that the freedman shall have his piece of land. Do it as you please, but do it you must. If you postpone the question you postpone a true reconstruction.

It is because the resolutions on your table embody that proposition and kindred propositions that I have desired to call the attention of the Senate to them on this first day of our meeting. If Senators are disposed to consider them and to vote upon them to-day, I should be glad of it; but if Senators are disinclined—the Senator from Maine intimates that he is disinclined—I shall make no objection to their going over to another day; but I trust that these propositions will not be forgotten in any measures of reconstruction which we may act upon hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up these resolutions for consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that there is a committee out which has gone to call upon the President, and we ought to wait until they return.

Mr. CRAGIN. Very well; I withdraw my motion.

Mr. RAMSEY. We can take a recess, but I believe it is usual to remain in session until that committee returns.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is always customary.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is always customary. The chairman of that committee, the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, who is out on that committee, made that suggestion to me, and he is versed in all these rules of etiquette. I suggest that we take a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. CRAGIN. I withdraw it.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate take a recess for one hour. ["Oh, no; a quarter of an hour."] Very well; I will move that the Senate take a recess for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at the expiration of the allotted time.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 3, 1867.

The House of Representatives reassembled this day, in pursuance of the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, and at twelve o'clock m. was called to order by the Speaker, who said: The recess having expired, the House of Representatives resumes its session. The Clerk will read the concurrent resolution prescribing the order of business at this adjourned meeting of the first session of the Fortieth Congress of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby directed to adjourn their respective Houses on Saturday, March 30, 1867, at twelve o'clock meridian, to the first Wednesday of July, 1867, at noon, when the roll of each House shall be immediately called, and immediately thereafter the Presiding Officer of each House shall cause the Presiding Officer of the other to be informed whether or not a quorum of its body has appeared; and thereupon, if a quorum of the two Houses respectively shall not have appeared upon such call of the roll, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall immediately adjourn their respective Houses without day."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now call the roll of members to ascertain whether a quorum is in attendance.

MEMBERS PRESENT.

The roll being called, the following-named members responded. From the State of—

When the name of Mr. SHELLABARGER was called,

Mr. GARFIELD said: My colleague, Mr. SHELLABARGER, is quite unwell. He intended to be here, but his illness has prevented his coming. He will probably not be here during this session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, no business can interrupt the roll-call. Excuses must therefore be made afterward, if at all.

During the roll-call,

Mr. W. J. McDONALD, Chief Clerk of the Senate, was introduced, and said: I am directed by the President of the Senate to inform the House of Representatives that the roll of the Senate having been called at twelve o'clock this day, as required by the resolution of the two Houses of 29th March last, fixing a day for the temporary adjournment of Congress, it appeared that a quorum of the Senate was present. [Applause.]

The roll-call having been concluded—

The SPEAKER. One hundred and twenty members having answered to their names, a quorum is in attendance; and the Clerk of the House, in accordance with the concurrent resolution, will notify the Senate of that fact.

Before proceeding to business the Chaplain will offer prayer.

Rev. CHARLES B. BOYNTON, Chaplain of the House of Representatives, then delivered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer, before the Throne of Thy Son, the manifested God, we bow for worship and for praise. We thank Thee for that preserving care and love by which all of these, when separated from each other in their distant homes, have been kept through the overwatching of our Heavenly Father.

We bless Thee, O God, that death has not visited any member of this body, so far as we know, during this recess. We thank Thee that no great sorrow has fallen upon the beloved households of these members; that they are here this morning through the ordering of Thy providence to answer once more to the call of their country. Blessed be God that when any sudden danger threatens the land, just as suddenly the great constitutional shield can be interposed. And now we invoke Thy blessing O God Almighty, upon this House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States in Congress assembled.

Do Thou grant unto the Speaker of this House new strength for all his arduous duties. Give him, we pray Thee, all the wisdom he needs rightly to decide any perplexing question which may arise, and to preside as he has hitherto done with dignity and with the approval of those over whom he rules officially, the House of Representatives.

And grant, O God, special wisdom unto all these members, that they may meet as they should, citizens of this great country, guardians of the country's welfare and responsible unto God, the great questions which may be presented; and may all be so settled that God shall approve and all inure to the final settlement and stable prosperity of the country.

Incline the President of the United States so to use his great power that the peace of the country may be promoted thereby; and may all who advise him so help to influence him that, coöperating, with the legislative branch of the Government, he may at last see the country thoroughly restored and placed upon the great foundations of the principles of our Lord and Saviour. Hear us, O God, and forgive all our sins, and accept us through the riches of grace in Christ Jesus, our Redeemer. Amen.

ABSENCE OF A MEMBER.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that Governor Blair has been detained from this Hall for the purpose of delivering an oration upon the occasion of laying the foundation of a Soldiers' Monument in my State.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS-ELECT.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the administration of the oath of office to members-elect from States which have elected during the recess.

Hon. THOMAS A. JENCKES and Hon. NATHAN F. DIXON, of the State of Rhode Island, and Hon. JULIUS HOTCHKISS and Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, of the State of Connecticut, were then sworn in.

MEMBERS-ELECT FROM KENTUCKY.

The Clerk called the following as the members-elect from Kentucky:

- |                      |                     |
|----------------------|---------------------|
| 1. L. S. TRIMBLE.    | 5. THOMAS L. JONES. |
| 2. JOHN YOUNG BROWN. | 6. JAMES B. BECK.   |
| 3. J. PROCTOR KNOTT. | 7. GEORGE M. ADAMS. |
| 4. A. P. GROVER.     | 8. JOHN D. YOUNG.   |

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Before the oath is administered to the members-elect from Kentucky, among whom I hear the name of John D. Young for one, I desire to state to the House that I am in possession of a protest, signed by Samuel McKee, a former member of this House, against the admission of Young, or his being qualified for a seat upon this floor as a member of the House of Representatives, upon the ground that he has aided and abetted the traitors engaged in rebellion, and actually commanded bands of rebels who have captured Union men, and thus been engaged in war against the Government. The protest embodies several other reasons why he should not be admitted to take the oath. This is accompanied by other protests from many citizens of the fourth district of the State of Kentucky, presenting the same reasons. The protests are sustained by affidavits proving those facts which are alleged.

I shall send these papers to the Chair and ask that the protest of Mr. McKee and of the citizens, or as much of these papers as the House shall feel disposed to listen to, shall be read now, together with some portion or all the testimony sustaining it. I also make the motion that John D. Young be not now sworn as a member of the House of Representatives, but that his credentials, together with these papers, be referred to the Committee of Elections to report in the case.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio I desire to offer the following resolution, and to state my reasons to the House for so doing:

Whereas there is good reason to believe that in the election recently held in the State of Kentucky for Representatives to the Fortieth Congress the legal and loyal voters in the several districts in said State have been overawed and prevented from a true expression of their will and choice at the polls by those who have sympathized with or actually participated in the late rebellion, and that such elections were carried by the votes of such disloyal and returned rebels; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the credentials of all members elected from the State of Kentucky shall be referred to the Committee of Elections, to report at as early a day as practicable, and pending the report of said committee none of said members shall be allowed to take the oath of office and admitted to seats as such.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Illinois asks to be permitted to explain his reasons for offering the amendment. I think it will be better that the papers which relate to the original case be read first, and then I will yield further time to the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the papers had better be read, so as to bring the case before the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to reserve only my right to reply.

The Clerk read the protest, as follows:

To the Honorable Members of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, who states that he has given notice, as the law requires, of his intention to contest the right of John D. Young to a seat as member of the Fortieth Congress of the United States from the ninth district of the State of Kentucky, hereby enters a protest and remonstrance against said Young being permitted to qualify, and against permitting him to assume or exercise any of the duties of a member of the Congress of the United States, and for the following reasons, to wit:

First. That during the late rebellion he (Young) did not remain loyal to the Government of the United States.

Second. That he voluntarily gave aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto. That he was in full sympathy, free accord, and entire harmony with persons who were engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, and who, during the late rebellion, sought the establishment of a separate southern confederacy.

Third. That in 1861, while he held the office of judge of the county court of the county of Bath, to which he was elected in the year 1858, and before entering upon the duties of which he had to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, he violated his solemn oath by aiding, counseling, countenancing, and encouraging the rebellion against the Government of the United States, and also to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto.

Fourth. That in 1861 he advised the recruiting of men to fight on the side of the southern confederacy, and advised and advocated resistance to the authority of the Federal Government by arms, and gave aid, counsel, countenance, and encouragement to those who did resist.

Fifth. That he (Young) himself joined the rebel army in 1861, and was a candidate for colonel of a regiment in the same.

Sixth. That he aided armed bands of rebel soldiers in capturing Union citizens and soldiers, and gave this aid voluntarily and gladly.

Seventh. That in 1861, while he was still acting county judge, he boldly and actively advocated the election of John S. Williams, an avowed secessionist, to the Congress of the United States, when said Williams declared himself in favor of resisting by arms the march of the Army of the United States into the southern States, and declared he would join the rebel army if force was used to compel obedience to the laws on the part of the southern people; and also the election of Dr. Parish to the Kentucky Legislature, who declared himself in favor of the secession of Kentucky; that said Parish and Williams both soon after their defeat, went into the rebel army, and he (Young) himself did likewise. That in 1862, while he was still judge of the county court of Bath, when summoned by the United States authorities, in obedience to the orders of the commander of the department of Kentucky, to renew his oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States, he fled to Canada.

Eighth. That at all times during the late rebellion he was an open advocate of the cause of the southern confederacy and opposed to the success of the Federal armies.

Ninth. That said John D. Young holds the oath which all persons are required to take before entering upon the discharge of their duties as executive, judicial or legislative officers of the Government of the United States, to be unconstitutional, and that the whole rebel Democratic party to which he belongs in Kentucky holds the same thing. That he and they deny the right of Congress to require such oath of any officer of the Government, (namely, the oath prescribed by act approved July—, 1862), and holds to the doctrine that it is no crime or no perjury even, if a man has been guilty of aiding the rebellion, to take said oath, and that it is the right of all rebels to take any oath required, and that by so doing they cannot commit perjury.

Tenth. That said Young holds that the rebellion was no crime; that those who engaged in it were justifiable, and that those who engaged in its suppression are guilty of a criminal wrong; that he so held during the war, and declared that "Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, in using force to suppress the southern rebellion, was a traitor, and ought to be hanged as high as Haman."

All the charges set forth in these ten specifications the undersigned believes he can and will prove to the satisfaction of the House and country. He herewith submits affidavits in substantiation of the charges, and has more witnesses to prove the same facts, and witnesses who will prove others not herein established, but has not yet taken their affidavits for want of time, and in some cases because the witnesses have refused to appear and testify for fear of violence to themselves or injury to their property by the friends of John D. Young, who claims the seat. He requests that said Young's credentials be sent to the proper committee for examination, and that he be not permitted to qualify until said committee have reported on his eligibility to a seat in Congress from the proof which will be submitted to them.

Respectfully,

SAMUEL MCKEE.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution appointing a committee consisting of two members on the part of that body, to join with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, and that the Senate had ordered that Messrs. ANTHONY and BUCKALEW be the committee on the part of that body.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move the usual resolution of concurrence on the part of the House, and the appointment of a committee of three.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. FARNSWORTH, SPALDING, and WOOD, as the committee on the part of the House.

KENTUCKY—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to have the affidavits read?

Mr. SCHENCK. The protests of the citizens are substantially the same, embodying the charges made by Mr. McKee. I will ask to have the affidavits read, to show the House that these charges are sustained thus far at least by proof submitted with them.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio state that these affidavits are taken ex parte and without any notice to the member-elect?

Mr. SCHENCK. They are certainly ex parte affidavits, but sufficient, I apprehend, for this House to proceed upon as information. It is not proposed by any resolution now to declare that this man is not entitled to a seat, but that because of this showing his credentials, together with these papers, be referred to the Committee of Elections. That is my motion.

The Clerk then read the following affidavits:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Bath:

This day personally appeared before me W. S. Sharp, who states that he is a citizen of the above county and State; that he held the office of provost marshal of Bath county, Kentucky, in 1862, under an appointment from General J. T. Boyle, who then commanded the military department or district of Kentucky; that he had instructions to arrest and require all disloyal suspected persons to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States; that in obedience to said orders he summoned, among others, John D. Young, the same who is returned elected as a member of the Fortieth Congress of the United States of the ninth Kentucky district. That he had an interview with said Young, in which he took the grounds that the war was not a rebellion, but a revolution. That he put the question to the said Young, Do you think the South had just cause for revolution against the United States? He answered he thought they had. That he paroled the said Young until a certain day fixed upon. That he went to Louisville, Kentucky, and reported his case to General J. B. Boyle, and he (Boyle) told him to send J. D. Young to Camp Chase, Ohio. That he was unavoidably detained at Frankfort, Kentucky, for two days, and that the said Young did, as he was informed, appear at his office on the day he was required to do so, but not finding any one authorized to take charge of him he left for parts unknown to affiant; and further saith not.

W. S. SHARP.

Sworn to before me by W. S. Sharp, June 26, 1867.

E. VAN PELT,

Justice of the Peace, Bath county.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Montgomery:

This day personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the county and State above, Willis Hockaday, who states that in the year 1861 he was at work at Raccoon Furnace, in the county of Greenup, Kentucky. That in the month of September or October, of said year, a band of rebels came to said place from the Upper Sandy country on a raid; that they captured a number of men and carried off a large number of horses and other property. Affiant states that he himself was captured by these rebels and carried off, but after four or five days made his escape. John D. Young, of the county of Bath, and the same man who was on the 4th day of May, 1867, elected to the Fortieth Congress from the ninth Kentucky district, was with said band of rebels, and was in command of the same, representing himself as a colonel, and was by the men under him called by that title. Affiant was captured in the night, taken out of his bed, ordered to get up and go with them, which he did. During the night affiant did not recognize any of the persons, but the next day saw Young among the men, and commanding them. After his escape he made his way toward Camp Dick Robinson, and on his way through Owingsville, Bath county, related the circumstance, and was then told that Young was absent from home and had gone to the rebel camp at Prestonburg. After his capture he was taken through Grayson, Carter county, and up Little Sandy to Dry Fork. At night affiant made his escape; and further saith not.

his

mark.

Attest: E. A. THOMAS, J. P. NELSON.

Sworn to before me by Willis Hockaday, who states in my presence, and the presence of the witnesses whose names appear above, that he has heard the foregoing affidavit read, and has fixed his mark to his name to the same, and that its statements are true. Witness my hand and seal this 15th day of June, 1867.

G. E. MILLER,

Notary Public for Montgomery county, Kentucky.

Mr. SCHENCK. Unless some other gentleman asks for the reading, I will not insist upon the reading of the whole of the papers.

Mr. KELSEY. I hope the papers will all be read, so that the case may be before the House to some extent at least.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, if the gentleman desires it, let the papers be read.

The Clerk was about to resume the reading.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. I do not know what may be the ruling of the Chair at this time, but the Speaker will recollect that at the time Mr. Stokes, of Tennessee, was about to be sworn in, or appeared at the bar for that purpose, I rose to make an objection. The objection I intended to make was one of a like character to this, and the Chair said that proceeding could not be interrupted for any such purpose. I now insist that the same ruling should obtain at this time that was held by the Chair at that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules, in accordance with the uniform usage of the present occupant of the chair and of every occupant of the chair, that it is for the House to determine what action it will take when a gentleman, claiming to have been elected a Representative, presents himself to be sworn. It is not for the Chair to rule that he shall or shall not be sworn. It is for the House to determine, and the Chair cannot recollect any such decision as the gentleman states. If the gentleman from Wisconsin had risen, as a question of privilege, to offer a resolution that the gentleman claiming to have been elected a Representative from Tennessee should not be sworn in until a committee reported upon his credentials, it would have been in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rose for the purpose of raising the question, but the Chair insisted that the proceedings could not be interrupted, as the gentleman was at the bar with regular credentials, to be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that his distinct recollection is that his ruling in that case was in conformity with the ruling which he now makes, that a majority of the House may make any order on the subject it sees fit. The House can, if it sees fit, refer the credentials to the Committee of Elections previous to the members being sworn in.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if it is not competent for the House, by its own action, to dispense with the further reading of the affidavits.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is entitled to the floor for one hour on his motion, and he presents these papers as a part of his speech. The Chair does not know of any rule by which the reading can be stopped if he desires their reading to be continued.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for the purpose of moving that the further reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can suspend the reading by his own act.

Mr. SCHENCK. I stated that I was willing to suspend the further reading of the papers, thinking that enough had probably been read to determine their character; but some gentleman insisted that it was proper to have the whole read as presenting the entire case, and I yielded on that account. I am still of the opinion, however, that it is not necessary to protract the reading.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can suspend the reading himself.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I will not ask for the further reading, but I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk the protest of Mr. Symes and accompanying affidavits against the swearing in of Mr. Trimble from the first district of the State of Kentucky, charging him with disloyalty. I do not desire to have them read, however.

A MEMBER. They had better be read.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, as gentlemen seem to desire it, I ask that they be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

Your petitioner, a citizen of the first congressional district of Kentucky, would respectfully state that at the last congressional election in this State he was voted for as the choice of the Union men or loyalists of the said first congressional district to represent them in the Fortieth Congress, and that he claims the seat for the following reasons:

1. The notorious disloyalty of Hon. L. S. Trimble, the Democratic candidate, who claims to be elected by a majority of votes, both during the war and since, shown by his aiding and abetting the rebellion by sending supplies, provisions, medicine, military equipments, and ammunition through the lines into the so-called confederate States during the war, which supplies were sent in violation of law, &c., and further shown by his disloyal acts and speeches made during the war and since; particularly in 1863, when he, said Trimble, was arrested and confined by the military authority for his open and avowed opposition to the war, and discouraging enlistments to the Federal Army; and also in the late canvass for Congress he states that he had always and did yet oppose raising men or money to suppress the rebellion; and by his declaring that he made it a point, and that he would swear to it, that he would always do what he could to keep out of any position any man who has been in the Lincoln army or wore the blue. The truth of these allegations the petitioner is able to establish by abundant evidence.

2. That Union men were in some localities intimidated and overawed from voting by being threatened and proscribed by the friends of said L. S. Trimble, lately in rebellion against the Government, which can be established by evidence.

3. That many unpardoned ex-confederate soldiers and paroled prisoners of war, who have never taken the oath or been included in any amnesty, were allowed and did vote for said L. S. Trimble in violation of law in such case made and provided, as can be shown by testimony of loyal men.

4. The election was illegally conducted by reason of men being appointed and serving as officers of the election who had been in the rebel army or who had aided, counseled, or advised the separation of Kentucky from the Federal Union by force of arms, or had adhered to those engaged in rebellion or sympathized with them; also by a large majority of the officers of the election being Democrats and favoring the election of said Trimble, and a very few belonging to the Union party favoring the election of the petitioner, which is in open violation of the State law, which provides that the officers must be chosen equally from the political parties, and the further provision that no one who counseled, aided, or adhered to the rebellion as aforesaid shall be considered so belonging to a political party, or competent to act as an officer of an election; which facts can also be shown by abundant testimony.

For the reasons above set forth, which substantially were embodied in a notice of contest served on the said L. S. Trimble within thirty days after the result of the election was declared by the State board of canvassers, the petitioner respectfully, but earnestly protests against said L. S. Trimble, claiming to be the member-elect from the first congressional district of Kentucky aforesaid, being sworn in as the member of Congress from said district, and asks that his credentials be referred to the proper committee of elections for investigation.

G. G. SYMES.

Mr. LOGAN. Accompanying this protest are affidavits, which I have not read, but which, I am told, fully sustain the protest. I do not ask to have them read at present. I will state that I have modified the preamble to my resolution; and it would probably be well that it should be read again, so that the House may understand the modification I have made.

The Clerk read as follows the preamble as modified:

Whereas there is good reason to believe that in the election recently held in the State of Kentucky for Representatives to the Fortieth Congress the legal and loyal voters in the several districts in said State have been overawed and prevented from a true expression of their will and choice at the polls by those who have sympathized with, or actually participated in the late rebellion, and that such elections were carried by the votes of such disloyal and returned rebels; and whereas it is alleged that several of the Representatives-elect from that State are disloyal.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I trust that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] intends to found any argument on the affidavits to which he has referred he will have them read, so that the House can be informed of their contents.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly have no objection to the reading of the affidavits, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand that Mr. Trimble knows nothing of their contents, nor by whom they are made.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly shall not object to the reading of the affidavits. The argument, however, which I shall make will not be founded on any affidavits, nor will it be anything personal to Mr. Trimble.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Graves:

Affiant, Lucian Anderson, states that he is a resident of the county and State above set forth, and was a resident of said county and State in the year 1863; that he is now and was in the year 1863 acquainted with L. S. Trimble, who now claims to be the member of Congress elect from the first congressional district of the State of Kentucky. That at the May term of the Graves circuit court for the year 1863 the said Trimble, then being a candidate to represent this district in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, he, the said Trimble, made a speech at the court-house, in the town of Mayfield, to a large crowd of persons there assembled, most of whom were rebel sympathizers, who had sent for the said Trimble to come up from Paducah and address them on the then question of the rebellion existing against the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Affiant states that said Trimble spoke on the occasion referred to for about two hours, that he denounced the President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, as a violator of the Constitution in the prosecution of the war against the so-called confederate States; that he, the President, had deceived and misled the people by saying that he did not intend to interfere with slavery in the State. His whole speech was in denunciation of the Government and those who sympathized with it against the rebellion. About the time Trimble closed his speech I asked him to tell the large concourse there assembled whether, if elected to Congress, he would vote men and money to prosecute the war against the rebels in arms against the Government of the United States. He for some time endeavored to evade or dodge the question, but affiant states that he pressed the question on him (said Trimble) time and again, and he finally told the people, if elected, he would not vote a man or a dollar to sustain the armies of the Government then in the field to put down the rebellion. Affiant says that the speech infused new life and hope in the rebels, and was calculated to prevent persons from joining the Federal Army or taking sides with the Government of the United States.

Affiant states further, that in June, 1863, he met said Trimble at Benton, in Marshall county, Kentucky, where he made to the people of that county the same character of speech as is above set forth. These are the only places affiant met said Trimble in debate. In 1863, a short time after the meeting at Benton, affiant learned that said Trimble had been arrested and taken to Henderson, Kentucky, by the military authorities.

LUCIAN ANDERSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, by Lucian Anderson, June 20, 1867.

W. H. MILLER, Notary Public.

Affiant, J. T. Bolinger, states that he is a citizen of Graves county, Kentucky; that he met with Hon. L. S. Trimble in the city of Cincinnati in the summer of 1861, and that said Trimble told affiant that he (Trimble) with others had formed a partnership, and was then in Cincinnati for the purpose of buying bacon, flour, coffee, sugar, and a general assortment of groceries, which were to be sent South. Affiant further states that Mr. D. Elethorp, who was with said Trimble, and had the supervision of buying the stock, told affiant at some time that their purchases at that time would be about three hundred thousand dollars. Large quantities of groceries were shipped to Paducah, Kentucky, and said to be placed in the hands of said Trimble's partners, who were rebels, and who shipped the same, part in the direction of Camp Boon, where there was a large encampment of rebel soldiers, and part in the direction of Union City, where were encamped about ten thousand rebel soldiers. Affiant further states that in the year 1863 said Trimble announced himself a candidate for Congress. At that time the rebel soldiers had been driven from this part of Kentucky, and the home rebels were very much disheartened and disorganized, and showed a disposition to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States and submit to the laws. The disloyal speeches of said Trimble in making the canvass, his course in denouncing the acts of the President, Congress, and those who were engaged in trying to suppress the rebellion were such, that it inflamed anew the public mind and aroused and rekindled the old fire of treason and rebellion in the people. His speeches had such a poisonous effect on the people that recruiting for the Federal Army was almost entirely suspended. While enlistments for the Federal Army was going on all the time, times for Union men became terrible; the worst passion against them was aroused in the bosoms of rebels; Union men were driven from their homes and many of them plundered and robbed of their all. After this canvass the country was overrun with bands of guerrillas, whose only object was to rob, plunder, and murder Union men. So disloyal were said Trimble's speeches that he was arrested and imprisoned by the military commander of the district.

Affiant further states that the election held in May last for member of Congress in this county was not held in accordance with the laws of Kentucky. Affiant says he has examined the poll-books used at the different precincts at the last congressional election; that there is ten precincts in said county of Graves, and that the law was violated in many of the voting precincts by persons being appointed and serving as officers of the election who had been in the rebel army, or who had aided, counseled, or advised the separation of Kentucky from the Federal Union by force of arms, or had adhered to those engaged in rebellion against said Government, and that the same number from each political party were not appointed officers of said election.

J. W. BOLINGER.

Sworn and subscribed before me, by J. T. Bolinger, this 25th day of June, 1867.

JOHN MARSHALL, Notary Public.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe I will suspend the further reading of the affidavits.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will yield for a moment, the Chair desires to make a statement.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] appeared to doubt whether the Chair ruled this morning as he did in the case of the Tennessee members. The Chair has had brought to the desk the Congressional Globe of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, by which the gentleman from Wisconsin and the House will see that the Chair, on the occasion referred to, ruled in precisely the same way as he has ruled to-day. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Wisconsin, unless the report of the Globe is incorrect, is mistaken as to the time when he interposed objections to the membership here of Mr. Stokes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It was not at the time when the letter of Mr. Stokes was read that I raised the question.

The SPEAKER. The record of the Globe (and it concurs with the recollection of the Chair) does not sustain the gentleman from Wisconsin. Upon the 24th day of July, 1866, the President having signed the bill in regard to the restoration of the right of representation to the State of Tennessee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moved the reference of the credentials to the Committee of Elections, when the following proceedings, which will be read by the Clerk, took place:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. LE BLOND. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the members-elect from the State of Tennessee, now present, have administered to them the oath of office.

"The SPEAKER. It is within the power of the House to refer to the Committee of Elections the credentials of any gentleman claiming a seat even from a State that has not been in rebellion. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is still on the floor, which would prevent the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] from being made.

"Mr. STEVENS. I believe that these credentials are in the usual form, and it is to be expected that they will be examined by the Committee of Elections just as the credentials are which are referred to that committee by the House. They will understand whether they are irregular or not. I now call the previous question.

"Mr. LE BLOND. Does not my motion take precedence of that?

"The SPEAKER. It does not; the usage has been precisely the other way. If a motion is made to swear in a man claiming a seat in the House after it is organized, and a member rises and moves to refer the credentials to the Committee of Elections, that motion is entertained and acted upon.

"Mr. LE BLOND. I have always understood that the credentials alone are considered prima facie evidence of a right to a seat when there is no contestant.

"The SPEAKER. That is only for the purpose of organizing the House. The Chair will refer the gentleman to a case in point. In the Thirty-Seventh Congress a gentleman from Tennessee (the Chair does not now recollect the name) claimed to have been elected a Representative from that State, and there was no contestant in his case. The credentials in that case were referred to the Committee of Elections, who examined as to the number of votes cast for him, the condition of the district, &c., and reported upon the case, and the Chair thinks he was admitted to his seat."

The SPEAKER. By a vote of 90 to 28 the credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections. The name of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] does not appear in this debate.

On the same day, as appears on page 4,106 of the same volume of the Globe, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] rising to a question of privilege, reported from the Committee of Elections that the various members claiming to be elected from the State of Tennessee were entitled to be sworn in, whereupon a colloquy ensued between the gentleman from Massachusetts and Mr. Le Blond, then a Representative from Ohio, which is followed by a paragraph which the Chair will read, and the recollection of the Chair concurs with the official report of the Globe. The gentleman from Wisconsin probably has in his mind the debate three days afterward. The Chair will now read from the Globe all that is stated to have occurred in regard to the swearing in of the members from Tennessee after the report of the Committee of Elections in their favor had been made and agreed to by the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was that when Mr. Stokes was sworn in?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read every thing that appears in the Globe reports as having occurred after the report of the Committee of Elections was adopted, and which relates to the swearing in of Mr. Stokes. It is the following very brief paragraph:

"Messrs. Nathaniel G. Taylor, Horace Maynard, and William B. Stokes then came forward amid applause, took the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, and took their seats in the House."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It was at that moment I rose, and the Speaker stated that the proceedings could not be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not remember it, and it does not so appear by the report in the Globe. The gentleman may have made the point three days afterward.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not make the point three days afterward, but I read the letter upon which the point was made.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to detain the House—

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. LOGAN. I do, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, if I understand this question as presented to us now it is that the credentials of all of the members who present themselves here from the State of Kentucky shall be referred to the Committee of Elections. I believe gentlemen who have been members of this House have protested against the swearing in of certain members of that delegation. I heard on that list as read by the Clerk the name of J. Proctor Knott, who claimed to be elected from the fourth congressional district of Kentucky. Mr. Knott was formerly a citizen of Missouri, a resident of the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor. He resided there I believe until 1862 or 1863, when he left that State and moved to Kentucky.

Mr. Knott in 1860, I believe, was elected attorney general of the State of Missouri, and served as such until by an ordinance of the State Convention he was ousted. In the winter of 1861, February I believe, the Legislature of that State, which was intensely rebel, as every one knows, called a convention for carrying Missouri out of the Union. Mr. Knott was elected as a member of that convention. He served, commencing the 4th of March of that year. He took an active part in the proceedings of that convention. The question of secession was discussed there, and various measures were brought before that convention for the purpose of accomplishing that result. Now, sir, I state here to-day that the records of that convention will show in all its proceedings that Mr. Knott was allied with those who were the most intense in their disloyalty to this Government, voting for and sustaining all the measures designed to accomplish the secession of the State of Missouri.

He was attorney general of the State of Missouri. At a subsequent session of the convention all of the State officers were deposed, as you all know, Claib. Jackson being Governor. Mr. Knott went out with the rest. In the session of 1862 he did not appear in his seat in the convention. It was declared vacant, and another was elected in his stead.

The disloyalty of Mr. Knott in that State is notorious. His status is as well known as that of any other of those who figured in the rebellion. I do not know there is any gentleman here who protests against his being sworn in as a member; but the facts being as I have stated them, I feel it incumbent upon me to rise in my place and object to the qualification of Mr. Knott as the Representative of the fourth congressional district of the State of Kentucky; and notwithstanding there is no contestant, I believe it is the duty of Congress, when the facts are so well known as in this case, that a person who has occupied the position he has, and taken the grounds he has during this war, shall not be permitted to occupy a seat upon this floor.

I am just informed that the defeated candidate in that district is going to contest the right to the seat. It is a fact I did not before know; but it is necessary the House should know these facts in order to judge of the character of the Representatives sent here from that State to represent her in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution to the House I do not do so with a view of striking at any particular member of Congress claiming to be elected from the State of Kentucky; but I do it for the purpose of establishing a precedent in this House which shall be placed upon higher motives than that of excluding any individual from a seat here. I ask that all the members-elect from the State of Kentucky shall be excluded from the privilege of taking the oath until an examination shall be had before the Committee of Elections. Why do I do so? Sir, it is upon the ground that this House should not be contaminated, or allow itself at any time to be so, by the introduction of any man into its Halls as a representative of the people of any district in the United States who has, during the rebellion, participated in any way whatever in it.

We must then examine somewhat into the status of communities as well as the status of individuals, for the purpose of laying the foundation and establishing a precedent for the examination of the members from other States who may present themselves hereafter where they have a disloyal constituency, and that we may examine all together. I present this question now, and think I can give facts sufficient to justify this House in excluding them for the present.

The accusation has been made against some of these members of disloyalty. Evidence has been produced sufficient to satisfy the minds of any disinterested person of the fact. Beyond that it is a historical fact that during the late rebellion a portion of the people of the State of Kentucky sought their representation in other halls than the Halls of legislation at Washington. The disloyal portion of the people of that State—and their name is legion—sought representation at Richmond under the pretended government of Jefferson Davis. They had their senators and their representatives in the rebel capitol until the close of the rebellion. During that time the loyal Legislature of Kentucky disfranchised a portion of its citizens for participation in the rebellion, but the very moment the rebellion was suppressed the portion of the people who had had representation at Richmond asked that the law by which they were disfranchised should be repealed, and it was done. Thereupon they changed their representation from Richmond, contaminated by treason, to these Halls, which ought to be sacred to loyalty.

It is upon this ground, upon the ground that a portion of the constituency of Kentucky whose hands during the late rebellion reeked with the blood of loyal victims, elected representatives who shouted treason in the halls at Richmond and then returned to their homes and aided in sending Representatives to these Halls, that I offer this resolution. Why, sir, it is a historical fact. We are bound to take notice of elections. I presume no man here will pretend that you have got to prove that an election took place at a certain time. It is an event that we must take notice of. An election took place recently in the State of Kentucky, in which a Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and members of Congress were chosen. What is the history of that election? A Governor to-day sworn in who was a traitor during the whole war, a rebel against the Government of the United States. I beg pardon; I am a little too fast. It is true, however, that a candidate has been elected on the same ticket with these men who stands before the country to-day a condemned traitor to this Government in the eyes of the world. And yet these people claim that they must have representation in Congress by presenting their members-elect without any investigation as to their loyalty.

If Kentucky can send members to this House under these circumstances, and in spite of objection or protest they may be sworn in as members under the rules and authority of this House, I ask any man to tell me why South Carolina may not do the same thing under the advice of the head of this Government. I believe it is our duty as members of Congress to inquire into their status. I care not what State does it. If the State of Kentucky, of Maryland, or of Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent, were to hold an election of members of Congress, and were to send members here who were known to the country as rebels, it would be our duty to inquire into their status. It would be our duty before allowing them to be sworn in to examine and see whether they were true and loyal men to the Government of the United States. I for one am not willing with my vote to allow any man to take the oath in the presence of this national assembly that he is loyal and will be faithful to the Constitution when I know that his constituency are disloyal and would send no other than a disloyal representative to Congress if they could avoid it.

It may be said that some of these members-elect have served in this Congress before, and that their loyalty has been proved. Why, sir, Jeff. Davis served in this Congress, and so has many a rebel. I do not mean that this gentleman is a rebel. I do not know anything about it. I have no accusation to make against any of the gentlemen claiming seats from Kentucky. I know nothing about their loyalty or disloyalty. I put it on higher ground. It is not upon the ground that these men were guilty of treason that I offer this resolution, but upon the higher ground that it is our duty to inquire into the loyalty of each and every one of these men before they are sworn in, coming as they do from a State or a district where disloyal men have charge and control of the government of the State.

That is the ground I put it on; and, sir, unless you adopt this course of policy, you will have this House filled hereafter with disloyal men; and you had just as well meet the question square in the face now as at any future time, for you have got to do it.

Men may say that action of this kind is too extreme; that it is too hasty, too radical, and all that sort of thing. It makes no difference to me, so far as I am concerned, what may be said. This is my theory of getting at this question. I do not believe that those States which have been in rebellion—and the only reason that Kentucky was not in rebellion was because it was too close to the border and was afraid to be, for in the hearts of a majority of its people treason ranked as it did in the hearts of the people of South Carolina—ought to be allowed to send disloyal men here; and if Mr. Trimble is a loyal man, or this soldier who was elected is a loyal man—and God knows I never heard anything against him in reference to loyalty or disloyalty, and hence I say I have no charge to make against any man, but upon the ground that the State has shown itself since the rebellion disloyal to the country, so far as the majority of its people were concerned—I insist that these men shall go before the Committee of Elections and let their loyalty be tested. If they are loyal men, they will pass through the ordeal and come out unscathed; if they are disloyal men, they must have an immense amount of impudence to present themselves here, and will only get that which is due them.

Now, sir, there is no use in our being so thin-skinned about these questions. Some gentlemen say, "Oh, it would not be right to keep these men out; we have had some of them in before." We should not be afraid to look the question in the face. The question is, What are you going to do hereafter? What are you going to do when some other State sends you up a whole delegation of such men? Are you going to swear each one in when there is no protest against his election? If you do, tell me whether or not Alex. Stephens or any of those men might not enter these Halls and take the oath? They can do so, and the only true course, in my judgment, is when a delegation comes from a State whose loyalty is questionable, whether it has been in the rebellion or not, to examine the whole delegation and admit such men as are loyal, and send such as are disloyal back to their constituents, and tell their constituents to send you a different class of men.

These are my views in brief in reference to this question. I do not desire to detain the House longer. I merely wished to state the reasons why I offered this resolution, and the grounds upon which I based it. Before I take my seat, however, I will modify my resolution by striking out the word "believed" and insert "alleged" in the first part of the preamble.

Mr. BROOKS obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have reduced my motion to writing so that there may be no question about its form, and I ask to have it read in the shape in which I now present it. I would inquire at the same time how the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is offered. Is it in the form of a substitute or of an addition?

The SPEAKER. It is offered by the gentleman from Illinois as a substitute.

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit as a question of order that the resolution offered by my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] is a resolution which goes to the qualification of the member named. I submit that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] goes in general to the right of the State to representation at all, as illustrated by the speech which he has made. I see no objection on precedent or principle to proceeding seriatim against any number of members on a presentation like that made by my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] or a presentation like that made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] upon his own responsibility in regard to a member; but I think that this thing of introducing a resolution, which in effect denies representation to an entire State which by our own laws and our own acts has been and is recognized as organized and entitled to representation, is without any good precedent to sustain it.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me. My resolution does not deny representation to the State at all, but merely insists that the State must show a loyal representation before its members obtain seats here.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not misunderstand the gentleman at all. I say that the State is entitled to representation upon the presentation of its certificate under its great seal, and that the members are entitled to be sworn in according to the established precedents of this country unless special charges be made showing them not entitled or disqualified. They have the right to be sworn in unless there be presented specific causes against them, in which case I say the case ought to be referred to the committee, as proposed by my colleague. I believe my colleague has presented the question exactly according to the established precedents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] raises the point of order that the amendment is not in order. It is hardly necessary to remind the gentleman from Ohio, who is an old member of the House, that a point of order upon a resolution must be made when the resolution is presented and reported at the Clerk's desk. After the proposition has been entertained and debated, any point of order which might have been raised is regarded as waived by the House. The original resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is to suspend the administration of the oath to one member-elect from the State of Kentucky until a report by the Committee of Elections. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] moves to amend so as to suspend the administration of the oath to all the members-elect from Kentucky until there has been a report from the Committee of Elections. If the point had been made in time, the Chair would have no difficulty in deciding it under the precedent of the House in the Tennessee case; but as the point cannot be entertained at this time it would not be proper for the Chair to decide it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Speaker will permit me to say that I some time ago inquired whether the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was a substitute, and I understood the Speaker to say then that it was. I went to my colleague, and I understood that it was a proposed amendment from him. Hence I did not raise the point sooner. I do not doubt that the Speaker has ruled correctly; but I desired to make this statement in justification of my own conduct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels quite certain in the opinion he has intimated, because it corresponds with the uniform precedents of the House. In the case of Tennessee, although Congress, with the concurrence of the President, had declared it entitled to full representation in both branches of Congress, the House, by a vote of 90 to 28, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] concurring in that vote, referred the credentials of the claimants before they were sworn in to the Committee of Elections. That is a precedent which the Chair is bound to follow. It is a precedent made by the House, not by the Chair.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire that my resolution, as modified, be read before the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] proceeds.

Mr. BROOKS. I will yield for that purpose. The Clerk read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That John D. Young, claiming to be one of the members-elect to this House from the State of Kentucky, be not permitted to be sworn in as such member, but that the credentials of said John D. Young, together with the protest of Samuel McKee and other citizens of said State accompanying the affidavits, be referred to the Committee of Elections; and that the said committee be instructed to investigate and report on the charges and facts of the case, and whether said Young is entitled as a loyal citizen to a seat in this House; and that the committee have power to take testimony, and for that purpose to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] yield to me that I may offer an amendment to the original resolution?

Mr. BROOKS. I give way that the amendment may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the resolution the following: Resolved further, That the credentials of John Proctor Knott, who claims to have been elected to this House from the fourth district of Kentucky, be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire as to the loyalty of Mr. Knott during the late rebellion, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not yield for the purpose of allowing that amendment to be offered at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, we are in the midst of a revolution more potent than that through which we have passed during the late civil war, if the doctrines of the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] are to be adopted by the action of this House; for he has here proclaimed principles which are in utter violation, not only of all existing laws, but of the Constitution of the United States; principles which will transfer to this Hall contests which in a civil point of view are of as solemn a character as those which have been transacted in the field.

Sir, I deprecate such speeches, and I deprecate the introduction of such resolutions. Kentucky, by the Constitution of the United States, is entitled to representation upon the floor of this House. Kentucky has never gone out of the Union. Kentucky, in the midst of trials and tribulations, has ever been loyal to this Union. Kentucky has been represented during the whole war upon the floor of this House by members of various parties. It is only now, when her delegation is united, that an effort is made to disfranchise the State of Kentucky and deprive that State of all representation upon the floor of this House.

Sir, this is revolution, civil revolution, and nothing but revolution; and I tell the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that without any regard to the South there is a feeling among the people of the North which will not submit to such a revolution. No fight will be had in the tented field. There will be no transfer of the contest from the ballot-box to the bayonet, but here upon the floor of this House the Democracy of the North will meet and claim their rights; here soon the Democracy of the North will meet the Democracy of the South and West, and here we will have a majority upon the floor of this House.

Sir, there is a revolution already going on in the North. There is not only a loud and thundering voice from one of the New England States, but more or less from all the States of the North, and the time is rapidly coming when there will be no longer a simple minority of Democrats upon the floor of this House, but a large and powerful representation of Democrats here.

Now, if gentlemen are to use their power here upon the floor of this House to exclude a State like Kentucky, what will be the consequence of action so violent and so revolutionary? It cannot be done without an utter violation of law, violation of the principles of law and without utter violation of the Constitution of the United States. And I tell the gentleman that we no longer intend to submit to violations of the law or to violations of the Constitution of the United States.

Sir, he says the State of Kentucky is disloyal. There is a record of her loyalty in our armies and upon the floor of this House. There is a record of her representation here throughout the whole war; and if I were to take charges of his loyalty which were uttered against gentlemen from various parts of the Union, I, as an old Whig in 1860, would be ready to charge upon the gentleman from Illinois, then a Democrat, that he was disloyal, utterly disloyal to the principles of the Government of the country. If these imputations of disloyalty upon the floor of this House are to be the true tests of representation upon this floor—

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BROOKS. Before I go further, permit me to say that I do not make any such charge of disloyalty against the gentleman. I do not know what were the purposes of his heart, and I do not make any such charge.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not listening at the time, and I understand the gentleman made some remark as applicable to myself. I ask him to repeat it.

Mr. BROOKS. Sir, I say, educated as I was, a Whig, one of the members of the Whig party when the honorable gentleman was a member of the Democratic party—

Mr. LOGAN. That does not apply to me.

Mr. BROOKS. Not at all.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not necessary then to repeat it. I understood, though I may be mistaken, that you made some charge personal to myself.

Mr. BROOKS. Not at all. I was only illustrating, arguing that these charges of disloyalty against any members of that side or this side ought not to be accepted in good faith by any member of the House acting on a contested-election case; that charges of disloyalty were no disqualification for membership; that members might differ in reference to what constituted loyalty or not. That was the tendency of my argument.

Sir, Kentucky furnished during the war eighty-eight thousand troops to the Army of the United States, a State that is here attempted to be excluded from the floor of this House, and when one of the members now attempted to be excluded from the floor was a major in the Federal Army during the war. I refer to George M. Adams.

Mr. LOGAN. How many troops did Kentucky furnish?

Mr. BROOKS. Eighty-eight thousand.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman inform us how many of these were dark-colored gentlemen? Twenty-nine, I think, if you will examine.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman is much better informed on that subject than I am.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman tell me how many Kentucky furnished the rebel army?

Mr. BROOKS. I have not the statistics of the rebel army.

Mr. LOGAN. As I am better informed than the gentleman I will tell him. She furnished forty thousand.

Mr. BROOKS. No inconsiderable part of Illinois went over into the rebel army, and if that were a good reason for the exclusion of Kentucky, it would also be a good reason for the exclusion of a large part of Illinois, Missouri, and Tennessee. The declaration that I made was that the government of Kentucky, the authorities of Kentucky, the majority of the people of Kentucky, were with the Federal Army through the war, and furnished eighty-eight thousand Federal soldiers.

Mr. INGERSOLL. One moment, to correct a statement the gentleman has just made. If I understood him correctly, he states that quite a large portion of the people of Illinois went into the rebellion.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh no; I say it has been so charged.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, if it has been so charged, it is time it should not be again repeated.

Mr. BROOKS. I think so, too.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I hope the gentleman will not slander the State of Illinois by repeating such charges.

Mr. BROOKS. I only repeated it to show that reports of this character are no reason for the disqualification of Representatives from a loyal State like Illinois.

Mr. INGERSOLL. One word. The gentleman knows that it is a notorious fact that Kentucky furnished a great many troops for the rebel army, while a very few were raised for the southern cause living in the southern part of Illinois—a few enthusiastic young men, not exceeding a hundred in all, while two hundred and fifty thousand men in that State shouldered their muskets to crush out the rebellion which seeks entrance here to-day.

Mr. BROOKS. What I mean to say is simply this: that because a considerable number of the people of any State of the Union went into the rebellion, it is no reason for the disqualification of members elected from that State or for striking it out of the Union.

Now, what are the facts which are presented in the case? A law of the Congress requires the Clerk of the House to read the credentials of a member presented to the Clerk. Now, if these credentials had been presented at the organization of this House, there is no earthly doubt that the member from Kentucky would have been sworn in by the Clerk and would have voted for Speaker with other members. The question of the right of any of these members-elect from Kentucky to a seat would not have been made until the House was organized, and then it would have been made by a reference to the Committee of Elections. But because it was the misfortune of Kentucky to hold her congressional election subsequent to March, in accordance with the requirement of the law of the State, she lost her representation on this floor. Because it was the will of this Congress to organize and assemble at a period earlier than usual, the question is now made for the Speaker of the House upon the very credentials that would have been presented at its organization, and in the midst of an exciting contest some of these members-elect are pronounced rebels, even without being here in their places on the floor. What could be more unjust, more utterly in violation of precedent? Here is my friend from Kentucky before me, [Mr. Trimble,] a Representative in the last Congress, who has been serving upon your committees in various capacities, trusted by the Speaker of the House, now for the first time denounced by the gentleman from Illinois, or through a memorial which he presents, as a disloyal member. A member re-elected by over 8,000 is now unable to rise upon the floor of this House, and pronounce utterly untrue the statements in the memorials presented by the gentleman from Illinois. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois is not only to exclude the whole Kentucky delegation, but to exclude a member who for the two years past has been associated with him on a committee and otherwise, now for the first time pronounced disloyal to this Government, and why? I will not say why; the decorum of the House will not permit me.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question just here?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Suppose disloyalty is found by the committee and acknowledged by all; suppose the candidate has been in the confederate councils for years or left the service in the confederate army; does the gentleman from New York consider that a disqualification, the fact being abundantly proved?

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will find the question he asked me answered in the course of my argument. Permit me here only to say that there is no one thing upon which men differ so much as upon the question of loyalty or disloyalty. I believe in one species of loyalty and the gentleman from Pennsylvania in another. Loyalty is a word of French derivation, and means devotion to the maintenance of law. In that sense I am loyal; no man is more loyal than I am, or have been, or ever will be. But if disloyalty consists in infidelity to the party with which the gentleman is associated, if it consists in voting for the Democratic and not the Republican party, then, like the gentleman from Kentucky, I am disloyal from the first start, and the gentleman can make the most of it.

I was about to say when I was interrupted that I hold in my hand the certificate of one of the Representatives from the State of Kentucky. It is in the usual form of that old and gallant State of the Union, the State of Harry Clay, a State which educated me in my Whig principles, to which I ever have been faithful, and to which I am faithful now. Here is the paper:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

The undersigned, a board for examining the returns of the election held the 4th day of May, 1867, hereby certify that John D. Young received a majority of the votes given for the office of Representative in the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and was, therefore, duly elected to that office for the term prescribed by the Constitution in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

THOMAS E. BRAMLETTE,
Governor of Kentucky.

JOHN A. HARLAN,
Attorney General.

W. T. SAMUELS,
Auditor Public Accounts.

These credentials are not signed by Governor Helm or by any of the executive officers whom the gentleman from Illinois chooses to asperse, but are signed by men as loyal as he or any other member upon this floor. It is the usual certificate prescribed by the laws of Kentucky, and which hitherto has been received by the Speaker without dispute. Here then are the usual credentials, and here are the Kentucky members claiming their right to seats in this Hall. If you do exclude them what will be the effect? Just the same as when you drove me from this House because I was "disloyal," elected by a small majority, but rolled back here by over six thousand majority. I tell you that if you exclude these members from Kentucky, these or some other men of the same school of politics will come thundering back here by over a hundred thousand majority. Mr. Young, whose seat is particularly contested by McKee, and who was elected by 1,500 majority, will come back here by five or six thousand majority if you drive him from the floor of this House, and that will be the only effect of your rejection. It will increase the popular majority of these men; it will strengthen them at home; it will strengthen the Democratic party; while you are committing injustice and wrong and outrage, it will but add to the force and vigor of the party with which I am associated.

Sir, what is this House called upon to do? Why, to transform itself into a contested-election committee, a committee on credentials. This House composed of one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty members is to act as a committee on contested elections, and for this purpose ex parte affidavits are brought here to prepare public opinion for the justification of the act.

Here is a long document presented by a late member of the House, Mr. McKee, who made his contest fairly and squarely before the people, and who was defeated there by 1,500 majority. He now comes here relying upon the party majority upon the other side, hoping that you will override all credentials, all constitutions, and all laws, and give him the seat in place of Mr. Young. Why, sir, if a man could be sworn out of his election by ex parte affidavits there is not a member upon the other side of the House or upon this who can hold his seat for an hour, for there are so many disappointed people in every election, and such is the exasperation of the minority, that ex parte affidavits to any amount can be brought here to swear out any sitting member. What a beautiful spectacle we shall present here in September if we continue to sit here. Tennessee will be here under the authority of the government of Brownlow, forced by packed majorities, in all probability, to elect a large number of Republican members of this House, representing an infinitesimal portion of the people. What will be the spectacle then if you establish this as the precedent, and ex parte affidavits are to exclude the Tennessee members from this floor without reference to the Committee of Elections? I tell you that we can produce affidavits here by the cart-load, by the ton; we shall be able to swear that violence, fraud, audacity, rebellion, the violation of all laws human and divine, have been resorted to in the State of Tennessee in order to elect those Republican members of Congress; and if you commit yourself to this precedent you must abide by it when those petitions come here from Tennessee. I invite them. I invite them here on the floor of this House. I invite the people of Tennessee to send them in if you establish this precedent. I say that cart-loads of affidavits and petitions can be presented to exclude the Republican members from Tennessee as you would now exclude the Democratic members from the State of Kentucky.

One of these affidavits comes from a man of the name of William Sharp, who had a personal quarrel with Mr. Young, who was a county judge in the State. In a case where a citizen was arrested with or without law by this provost marshal Mr. Young issued a writ of habeas corpus to bring the question of the imprisonment before him to test its legality; and thus there was excited some feeling between Mr. Young and this provost marshal, Sharp, to which the latter seeks to give vent on the floor of this House by presenting through some member here his remonstrance against the admission of Mr. Young; and the House, with only a partial knowledge of the facts, is called upon to adjudicate upon the whole case, without any reference to the Committee of Elections, and to exclude Mr. Young when he presents the credentials of the Governor of the State.

There is another affidavit from a man by the name of Hockaday, of whom we never heard before, about whom we know nothing—a man who has turned up in Kentucky, as Stephen Geoghegan, who swore me off the floor of this House, turned up in the city of New York. Members of the House will recollect the euphonious name of Geoghegan.

This man Hockaday, with a name almost as euphonious, makes an ex parte affidavit; and with all the abundant profusion of statement with which Geoghegan swore in the city of New York, Hockaday swears that Mr. Young was a colonel in the rebel army, &c., when the records of the State will show that at the very time when he is said to have been a colonel in the rebel army he was every day discharging the duties of the office of county judge in the State of Kentucky. The Republican members of this House are expected to be as credulous in the matter of Hockaday as they were in the matter of Geoghegan. If they follow that illustrious precedent, I can only tell them that my honorable friend from Kentucky, instead of coming here with fifteen hundred majority, will be returned by six or eight thousand majority.

Now, sir, a great State like Kentucky is not to be turned out of Congress in this way for any such cause as that suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] Why, sir, the majorities in that State are tremendous—not more tremendous, however, than they are in the gallant and noble metropolis whence I come, for her majorities are equally powerful. Why, sir, our city, that manned your ships with sailors, that filled your armies with soldiers, that gave her millions to replenish the national Treasury, that contributed so largely in every way to the triumphs of the country's flag, is no less disloyal than the State of Kentucky. One of my colleagues from the city of New York was elected by ten thousand majority, eclipsing even any of the majorities of the State of Kentucky.

Look for one moment at the majorities of these Representatives from the State of Kentucky. Mr. Trimble, from the first district, has over eight thousand majority. Mr. Brown, in the second district, has a majority of more than six thousand. In the third district, Mr. Hise had a majority of about seven thousand. In the fourth district Mr. Knott, against whom the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] declaimed so much, without any proof of the identity of the man he describes with the gentleman from Kentucky—without any evidence that the Kentucky Knott and the Missouri Knott may not be altogether different persons—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BROOKS. I cannot yield now. Mr. Knott has over five thousand majority. In the fifth district Mr. Grover has a majority of more than five thousand. In the sixth district Mr. Jones has six thousand majority. Mr. Beck in the seventh district has a majority of more than eight thousand. Then the eighth district gives a majority of over three hundred for Major Adams, a man whom the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] would brand as disloyal. Yet Major Adams has faced the bullets of the rebels upon the field of battle, and is as much entitled to credit at the hands of the country as the honorable gentleman himself, who might be expected to feel for him some sympathy as a gallant soldier, who has fought with him under a common flag. But the gentleman from Illinois, as a Republican member on this floor, would turn his back upon him, and exclude him from this floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] has persistently, though I presume not intentionally, misstated my proposition as expressed in my resolution and in my remarks. I stated that I had no charges to make against any of these men; that I placed my resolution upon a higher basis entirely than that of a charge against an individual—the disloyalty of the constituency in the State of Kentucky, and not as the gentleman says, for the purpose of excluding Kentucky from the Union, or for the purpose of excluding her Representatives from this Hall, but for the purpose of having the Committee of Elections report the facts to the House, and then to let the House determine whether these men are loyal or disloyal, and whether they were entitled or not to seats upon this floor.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the Clerk to read the gentleman's resolution.

The resolution was read.

Mr. BROOKS. The House will judge. The gentleman indorses the charges of alleged disloyalty by bringing in the resolution to exclude these members. The whole tendency of the gentleman's argument, as I understand it, as well as the tendency of his resolution, is to spread abroad charges of disloyalty against these gentlemen, and that, too, when I have shown him Mr. Adams was a major in the Federal Army, the highest proof of his loyalty. He has no objection to have facts reported. But instead of these charges being brought before the one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy members of this House they are to go before a Committee of Elections, which stands seven Republicans and two Democrats. The gentleman proposes to leave it to the Committee of Contested Elections to judge whether there is anything in the charges or not, and that before they are sworn in.

But in addition to that it is unjust to these gallant and noble Kentuckians; it is unjust to that old State to spread upon the record here and throughout the Congressional Globe, and by means of the telegraph, charges against her loyalty, and that she should not be represented upon the floor of this House because she aided and abetted the rebels. The whole thing is unjust from the beginning to the end, and it is because it is that I have risen to refute these charges at the time they are made.

Here are ten specifications signed by Samuel McKee, late a member of this House in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, against the right of John D. Young to a seat upon this floor. Instead of going before the Committee of Contested Elections he presents these charges in print and lays them before the House. I am authorized to say, I say it not for myself, but I am authorized to say that in form, in substance, in idea, in spirit, and interest these whole charges are false from beginning to end. They have scarcely a foundation in fact whatsoever. And I wish the country to take notice that these charges here made have been denied as widely as they are made.

The second specification is:

Second. That he voluntarily gave aid, countenance, counsel and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto. That he was in full sympathy, free accord and entire harmony with persons who were engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, and who, during the late rebellion, sought the establishment of a separate southern confederacy.

I will not detain the House to enter into a specific denial of these charges, although I might do so. All I have to say is that such allegations, such charges, such denials, are not proper matters for our investigation, but are proper matters to go before the Committee of Elections, where, if these gentlemen from Kentucky get even fair play, they will be more lucky than I was when I was before that committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose.

Mr. BROOKS. In one moment. Now, as regards these Kentuckians, there are but two contested seats out of the nine members-elect. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is to exclude the whole State. The gentleman from Missouri introduces charges against Mr. Knott, who was a citizen of Missouri, but afterward emigrated to Kentucky. In that case, in utter violation of the law of elections set forth in Brightly's Digest, where thirty days' notice of a contested election is required, in utter violation of that law he proposes here upon the floor of this House, after that time has altogether elapsed, to bring in a contested-election case, notwithstanding the facts were before as visible as they are now. Mr. Knott's record was as well known in Missouri and Kentucky as well then as now. But at this late period of the day the gentleman from Missouri makes a contested election in utter violation of the law which requires thirty days' notice.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state to the gentleman from New York that I do not propose to contest the election of Mr. Knott in this House, although I am informed his seat is to be contested. But the point I make is this: that Mr. Knott's disloyalty is so notorious it should prevent his occupying a seat upon this floor.

I take the same position the Senate of the United States has taken in reference to those who presented themselves to that body charged with disloyalty—that he is an unworthy member of the House, and as such we should refuse to receive him.

Mr. BROOKS. The Senate did not refuse to receive Mr. Bright; it expelled him.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I believe they never received the member from Maryland.

Mr. BROOKS. What member?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Thomas; his credentials are yet pending there.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, although I may have addressed the House in a partisan point of view, as the honorable gentleman from Illinois provoked that mode of address, I nevertheless trust and hope that the large majority on the floor of the House will look into this election question as one of precedent and of principle and not of party. There is no question of more importance, nothing that so closely reaches the foundation of all our institutions, as that of the right of members to their seats upon the floor of this House when elected to this body. It is not necessary for the party in the majority to exclude these nine Kentucky members in order to hold on to their power; but if they do exclude them they thereby proclaim to all the ten States which they have invited to come back into this Union, that this extraordinary session of Congress is called for the purpose of indicating or devising no means to bring them in. They but proclaim to the people of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas that no matter what they may do, even though they may elect an officer of the Federal Army to Congress, the most loyal man they can possibly find to represent them, in spite of all their efforts and sacrifices, when their Representative comes to present himself here he may be compelled to face an adverse majority upon an affidavit or charges like these brought before the House in the case of members from the State of Kentucky, and may after all be excluded from a seat in this House by the party in power.

I beg of you, Mr. Speaker, and of the House, I beg especially of you, sir, to exert your influence in this House to establish no such fatal or unfortunate precedent as that, for it will only be a proclamation, a pronouncement to all the other struggling and now disfranchised States, that, no matter what their sacrifices, all their efforts to obtain a representation upon this floor will be utterly vain against an adverse, irresistible, and unreasoning majority.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, it is alleged specifically that three members who present their credentials here for admission as Representatives from Kentucky are, by reason of their disloyalty, their acts of treason against this Government during the late rebellion, not entitled to seats here. Their seats are contested by those who opposed them in the elections, by those who were supported by the Union party in Kentucky. You have heard read the charges and specifications and the affidavits in support of them. A prima facie case has at least been made out against them. I trust this is not assuming too much, for I would not knowingly do an act of injustice to them.

It is further alleged that the entire delegation with one exception—at least, the resolution of my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] is based on that assumption—cannot rightfully take the oath prescribed by law, and therefore ought not to be admitted to seats here. That is assumed in the resolution, as I understand it; and in order to test the question of their legal right to admission as members, and in order that the House may vote understandingly upon it, it is proposed to refer their credentials to the Committee of Elections, and there let the case of each individual member be examined and inquired into, and if any one of the delegation is found worthy under the law to sit here, unquestionably the report of the committee will be in his favor; but if any of them are found to have forfeited their rights as citizens of the United States by reason of participation in rebellion, unquestionably the committee will so report, and without doubt this House will sustain that report by excluding the member or members proven to have been thus disloyal from the privileges of loyal Representatives, and will either allow the seat to remain vacant until the people of Kentucky send a loyal man here or award the seat to the loyal contestant.

Now, sir, for one I am glad we have met this vital question at the threshold. Here is the place to test the sincerity of the Union party. It is undoubtedly true that the loyal, patriotic, heroic Union men of this country saved it on the field of battle. They crushed the rebellion, and in consequence it has become one of the cardinal doctrines of the Union party, that loyal men shall rule the country maintained and perpetuated by their heroic and unparalleled sacrifices.

I repeat, I am glad that we have met this question at the threshold. Now is the time and here is the place to settle it. The Constitution says "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This clause gives us full and complete jurisdiction over the question before us. Let us dispose of it, as becomes the Representatives of a great and free people. Let us inquire into the "qualifications" of these gentlemen. Loyalty is a necessary qualification. Do they possess it? We propose to investigate that question, without unnecessary delay, by the proper committee. We do not propose to deal with Kentucky as though she were not entitled to representation on this floor. We say to her, "You are entitled to representation, but you have no right to send men here who aided the rebellion, who fought against the Union." I am not assuming that a disloyal representation has presented itself. I do not presume to declare in advance of the testimony that a single gentleman from Kentucky is disloyal or ever did give aid, countenance or encouragement to the rebellion. But I am insisting that Congress has the right to exclude disloyal men; men who engaged in the rebellion; men who committed treason against this Government. I care not whether the man comes from Kentucky or from any other State; the principle is the same.

If a rebel from Kentucky domiciliates himself in New York and becomes a citizen of that State, and should the people of New York see proper to elect him to Congress, must he be admitted? should he be admitted? I say no, never; Congress has the prerogative to exclude him and ought to exclude him.

There is no safety for the Republic in any other course. This is not an infraction of the right of representation; it goes only to the person of the Representative. The Representative must be a friend of the Union, not its enemy; if he is its enemy he should be denied a seat here, and I hold this to be our right, and for one I propose to exercise it now, if the facts are, as they are alleged in the resolution. Sir, there is such an organization in this country as a Union party, and for one I propose to do all that I can legally and constitutionally to maintain that party. It may be said that I am speaking now as a partisan. Perhaps so; but I am speaking as a partisan, as I understand it, in a good cause, in a patriotic cause, in a loyal cause, no less than the perpetuation of the Republic, and for the perpetuation of just and noble principles as the foundation of that Republic. If we desire to perpetuate the liberty and unity of the Republic, can we do it better than by maintaining the loyal, Union party? I hold that we cannot. Every blow against the Union party is a blow against republican and liberal institutions. You can strike no more direct blow at the Union party or the Republic than by giving aid and encouragement to the enemies of the Union; and if you admit here whomsoever the late rebels may see fit to send, do you not thereby encourage the rebel element in the southern States, until at last, by such encouragement, you will have created a power that will crush you? For one, I do not propose to do any such thing. I propose to act fairly, honestly, and honorably with the people of all sections of the country; but I do propose to maintain loyalty and to award the merit due to it, and when there is a contest in any district in this country between loyalty and disloyalty, I am on the side of loyalty and against disloyalty. If you wish to send forth a voice from this Hall that shall encourage the southern loyal people in their heroic efforts to build up a Union party there, exclude from seats here all rebels that may be sent from any State. If we send a greeting of this kind to the southern loyalists, you will nerve them to invincible perseverance, you will strengthen and encourage them amazingly, you will crystalize them around the principles of our Union party, and by such encouragement you will create a party able to maintain the principles for which, during four long years, the Union party fought, with a devotion and courage unprecedented. But if you admit, without question, to seats upon this floor men who were guilty of rebellion, do you not strike a blow at the Union party both North and South? Destroy the Union party, and will not the destruction of the Republic speedily follow? If this sounds partisan, I cannot help it. I see in the maintenance and continuance in power of the loyal Union party the true glory and perpetuity of the Republic. I see through the maintenance of that party the firm establishment of the principles of justice and universal liberty, the triumph of right and the downfall of wrong.

Now, sir, I take as an illustration of my position the case immediately before us: Samuel McKee, a known loyalist, devoted to the maintenance and perpetuity of the Union, who risked his life in the suppression of the rebellion, was elected a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress by a majority of 1,900; he was defeated as a candidate for member of the Fortieth Congress by 1,500 majority. How is this to be explained? In the election of 1865, when he was elected to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, the rebel element of Kentucky was disfranchised by the loyal Union Legislature which had been elected while the rebels of Kentucky were in the rebel army. In 1866 the Legislature of Kentucky repealed their disfranchising law, and flooded the polls of the ninth Kentucky district with the votes of returned rebel soldiers—this is alleged to be the state of the case; I do not speak from my own knowledge—and the consequence was that he was overwhelmed by 1,500 majority. It is said that since the disfranchisement of rebels in Missouri and Tennessee, and the enfranchisement of them in Kentucky, the disfranchised in the first named States find a cordial welcome and a congenial home in Kentucky. This may account for the extra large majorities against the Union party in that State at their late election.

Now, sir, I say for one, and I do not profess to speak for any one but myself, that if Samuel McKee, a loyal man, had received but one loyal vote, and assuming, which I do not say is the fact, that Mr. Young received 15,000 disloyal votes, he himself having been guilty of giving aid and encouragement to the rebellion, I for one should vote against the admission of Mr. Young and for the admission of Mr. McKee with but one loyal vote behind him. That is my position, gentlemen, and you may make the most of it. I do not intend to speak in such a manner that I can be misunderstood upon this question. It is, perhaps, the most vital question that has been brought before Congress for years, at any rate since the suppression of the rebellion. It is a question of the maintenance and ultimate triumph of the principles which were contended for during that terrible, long and bloody struggle.

If we are to admit the rebel element into Congress, what shall we say for loyalty? What apology can we make to the loyal men whom we will meet when we go home? None whatever; we will have falsified our pledges and our principles. We must maintain a loyal standard in Congress if we intend to maintain a loyal standard at home. If we desire that our constituents shall maintain a loyal standard there, let their Representatives maintain a loyal standard here. Thus there will be harmony of feeling, thought, and action upon these great and vital questions. If we sustain the cause of loyalty here to-day, we will find a sympathetic throb answering our manly and just action from the loyal hearts North and South.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] informs the House that we are in the midst of a revolution. Sir, I admit it. But the revolution was not inaugurated to-day; it is of long continuance; a revolution commenced by men disloyal to the Constitution and the Union; men whom, as I understand, the gentleman from New York is willing to see admitted to seats in this House, provided they get more votes at the election than their opponents, without reference to the question of their loyalty.

I admit that we are in the midst of a revolution; but I say to the gentleman from New York it is a revolution in favor of truth, in favor of justice, in favor of the universal rights of mankind. And I say, let the revolution go on until these grand principles shall be firmly established as the fundamental basis of the American Republic.

The gentleman from New York complains that we propose to strike Kentucky out of the Union. Why, sir, but for the timely action of the Union party and the loyal soldiers that marched into Kentucky from the northern States, Kentucky would have struck herself out of the Union years ago. The rebels of Kentucky did what they could to carry that State out of the Union; and when they failed by reason of the invasion and occupation of their State by the Union Army, some thousands of the disloyal citizens of that State took themselves out and joined the rebel army.

The "gallant Kentucky" that the gentleman talks so eloquently about is not the Kentucky of the last six years. The gentleman has certainly been in a sort of Rip Van Winkle sleep during that period of time. Twenty years ago Henry Clay did honor to "gallant Kentucky" by giving an impetus to liberty; by his efforts as a philanthropist and an avowed emancipationist and colonizationist. Those were the days of "gallant" Kentucky.

Sir, the "gallant" days of Kentucky were not during the recent rebellion. It is a historical fact that when Kentucky could not be taken out of the Union bodily as a State, Kentucky rebels took themselves out, and not only went into the rebel army, but went into the rebel Congress. There was in that State a rebel State government, which was recognized by the confederate government at Richmond. It was formed, if my memory serves me, by retreating rebels, who formed the nucleus of what they called a State government at Russellville, which was represented at Richmond until the cannon of Grant demolished the capital reared by treason and slavery. Representatives from the State of Kentucky took part in the Richmond Government with John C. Breckinridge as Secretary of War.

I ask, what kind of a record is this for "gallant Kentucky?" I will give Kentucky all just credit for gallantry. She has had and still has many gallant men devoted to the cause of Union and liberty. They did nobly for the Union; and I will tell you how I am going to make acknowledgment of their patriotic services. It is by the admission of loyal Representatives from that State to seats in Congress, and by excluding her disloyal. That is the way I am going to reward the gallantry of Kentucky.

Now, sir, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question, the substance of the question which was asked him by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] and which he did not answer. I suppose he forgot it. It is this: should John C. Breckinridge return to Kentucky, would he not be a citizen of that State? Has he ever lost his citizenship there by reason of his connection with the rebellion? Even if he has, supposing he should return to Kentucky and reside there one year, would he not be, according to the gentleman's idea, constitutionally eligible to a seat in Congress, if a majority of the people of any district there should elect him? I ask the gentleman to answer "yes" or "no." I have not time to yield the floor for a lengthy reply.

Mr. BROOKS. I am a Yankee, and could only answer one question by asking another.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If that is so, then I do not yield. Perhaps I ought to yield, as I am indebted to him for the floor. I thank him for the courtesy he has extended to me, and I will be guilty of no act of discourtesy to him. If the House will yield me five minutes more, I will then gladly yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining of the hour of the gentleman from New York. Is there objection to extending his time five minutes?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BROOKS. How did the gentleman vote in Colonel Stokes's case?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think I voted to admit him; and I will tell you what I would do if John C. Breckinridge had done no more than Colonel Stokes, and then, by way of atonement, as Colonel Stokes did, had served and fought four years in the Union Army. Why, sir, I would admit him to Congress, if he should be duly and legally elected, as against any man who continued in the rebellion, and now only weeps over the "lost cause," because it is "lost," and anticipates that in some future day the "lost" star of the southern confederacy will rise again. Now that I have answered him, will the gentleman be kind enough to answer my question to him?

Mr. BROOKS. I cannot pretend to answer in a half minute, but I shall avail myself of some other opportunity to state what, in my judgment, ought to be our conduct toward the rebels. I will not interfere with the gentleman by answering now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did understand that the gentleman from New York would make a direct answer to this question. I have answered him frankly. My question requires a categorical answer.

Mr. BROOKS. I will answer the gentleman at another time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will go as far as anybody else where magnanimity goes hand in hand with justice, but not one inch further. I hold it to be a violation of the principles of justice to admit rebels as fellow-members of this grand council of the nation.

Shall we do it? This is substantially the question before the House. I have not argued the case as though the evidence had been here, but I have given my views on an alleged case; and for one I feel it will do the country and the Union party more permanent good in raising and settling this question in Congress now, provided we settle it on just and correct principles, than any other act we shall do during the present session.

I speak in no spirit of vindictiveness. I am as anxious to see the southern States restored to the Union upon the grand principles of justice as any man. I shall welcome here the Representatives that the people of the southern States shall send, provided they come with "consciences void of offense" against this great Republic. But, sir, if they come here covered with fraud or stained with treason, I shall say, notwithstanding your people have the constitutional right to be represented, yet the Representatives of the people, in Congress assembled, have the constitutional right to inquire into your Representatives; and if they find them to be disloyal, if they find among them a Breckinridge or a Beauregard, or any other who has aided and abetted the rebellion, we will say, "Ye cannot enter here."

We will not discredit loyalty by admitting them here, but we will vindicate loyalty by rejecting them. I insist that we must be true to those who have themselves been true to the glorious, shining flag of freedom; thus we shall be enabled to hold aloft that grand, starry banner for ages to come, and it shall float over the Republic redeemed and regenerated, and none but loyal men shall be trusted and honored.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to protract this discussion by any argument. So far as I am concerned, I wish to draw the whole question toward a conclusion. It seems to me that which I have proposed is plain and practical. Persons claiming to be members-elect from Kentucky have called, that the oath may be administered to them, and that they may take their seats in this House. I have presented to you and to the House, by a protest in the case of one of them, which protest charges, among many other things, distinctly and positively that a person claiming to be a member-elect thus presenting himself to be sworn in is a public enemy—that he has been a public enemy; thus throwing upon him the burden of proof to show that he occupies a different position now; that he has been aiding and abetting the late rebellion, and actually participating in it as a commander of rebels raiding against the lives and property of Union men in the State of Kentucky. Along with this protest I present affidavits, ex parte, to be sure, for these are all, at this stage of the proceeding, which can be presented sustaining these charges, and upon this state of facts I ask that this man, claiming to be a member-elect, shall not be permitted to be sworn in and take his seat with the rest of us, but shall stand aside until these charges thus sustained by these statements and affidavits shall be, with his credentials, referred to the Committee of Elections, that they may investigate and report as to the facts whether he is thus disqualified or not, and to have the power to send for persons and papers, in order to enable them the better to conduct this investigation.

Now, sir, what is the objection? If there be any objection to it at all, stripped of the great mass of verbiage with which the excited gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] entertains the House, it amounts to this: he and any others who think with him claim that a traitor may come here bloody with treason, and that fact may appear probable to the House, and yet the House has no defense or protection, but must admit him upon the presentation of himself with his certificate of election, and must make the inquiry afterward. If the gentleman has claimed anything at all or proved anything at all by his argument and illustration, it would disable us from refusing to administer the oath to Jeff. Davis if he were to come here with a certificate of election. You will not get the gentleman from New York to say whether he would or would not vote for or against permitting Davis to be sworn in under such circumstances; neither will he say it in regard to Breckinridge, nor probably in regard to any traitor.

Now, I can understand that, because I know that the gentleman belongs to a party which does not distinguish between the man who sustained his Government and his flag in the time of trial, when rebellion was rampant over the land, and the man who was seeking to overthrow that Government and trample upon that flag. He belongs to a party which makes no distinction between the State of New York, which did not, as an organized community and one of the States of the Union, go into the rebellion and seek to throw herself out of connection with the other States, and the State of South Carolina, which went red-handed into the rebellion in her own character as a State and a people organized and individually. He belongs to a party which has not discovered even that there has been a war, if you may judge from their public documents and the sort of argument presented by them to the country. It is true, the gentleman says we are now in the midst of a mighty revolution; but when did he discover it? Not when red-handed rebels were trying to destroy you and me and our country, but when the rebellion is all over and we are undertaking to resettle the foundations of the Government, to get back to original principles, to maintain law and order, freedom and peace. Then he discovers that because some of our enemies are sharply dealt with, because the times require sharp remedies, we are in the midst of a revolution. I wish he and those who acted with him had made their discovery a few years ago. Then, perhaps, instead of their sympathizing with these rebels and giving them all the aid they could, except actual physical help, we should have had them united with the rest of the loyal men of the country and making quicker work of putting the rebellion down.

I do not wonder, therefore, that we have such objections coming from such a quarter. If you reduce all their arguments to a simple element and statement, it amounts merely to this: this House is asked to declare that no matter how apparent may be the treason or participation in rebellion of any one who comes here with a certificate of election, we are bound to admit him and postpone inquiry into the matter until afterward.

Sir, I present the practical question to this House, that here is a prima facie case made out. The House is not asked to declare that John D. Young is not entitled to a seat here, but it is asked to declare upon this showing that he shall not be permitted now to take the oath, but shall stand back until some inquiry shall be made into the truthfulness of these allegations, and a report made to the House upon which it can understandingly determine the question ultimately and finally.

That, sir, is the case of John D. Young. A member of the House rises in his place and avers that within his knowledge another of those claiming to be members-elect from Kentucky, Mr. Knott, has been also a participant in this rebellion. Sir, by the courtesy of a deliberative body like this such an allegation made by a member is always taken as a sufficient showing upon which to base action by the House; and if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] is ready with his proposed amendment to add another resolution directing the same inquiry to be made in the case of Mr. Knott, I will accept that resolution to go along with mine as a part of the series of resolutions which will then be offered to the House.

There is a protest accompanied with affidavits made in relation to another of those claiming to be members-elect, [Mr. Trimble.] If a like resolution be prepared with regard to him, or with regard to any one in reference to whom such allegations are made, I am ready to incorporate it with the general proposition I make to the House, so that either with or without division we may vote upon all the propositions.

But, sir, I go a little further in this, a good deal further, some gentlemen may perhaps think. I hold that it is not necessary (and this is what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has characterized as "revolution") to have distinct facts presented by affidavits or by authority, if there be within the general knowledge of the House, to its satisfaction, proof that the election in any particular district of country or in any particular State has been so conducted that the voice of the people has in all probability not been heard there, or their will perverted, or their choice been made distinctly, it is in the power of this House to pause at the very threshold and direct that an investigation be made in order to satisfy the House with regard to any Representative claiming to come from such locality, district, or State.

In the case of the Representatives from Tennessee, in reference to which there was read, by the direction of the Speaker, from the Congressional Globe this morning, a precedent relating to this matter upon a question of order, it will be remembered that among the things referred to the Committee of Elections to be inquired into, was the condition and state of affairs in the districts, in order that they might determine whether there had been a fair election or not.

Now, sir, for the case of Kentucky, my creed is very brief. I have believed all along, from the demonstrations made, and the developments in Kentucky during the war and since the war, that if she had gone fairly into the rebellion, and by an act of secession had arrayed herself with what was called the "southern confederacy," and been whipped back into her place, she would have been in a very much better condition than she actually is now. I believe from numerous letters that I have received, from various sources of information, from the public prints, that there has not been a fair election in all the districts of Kentucky. I think it probable that in addition to these three gentlemen named, there ought to be an inquiry made as to every one of the nine, excepting, perhaps, as to Mr. Adams, in regard to whom I have heard nothing of this sort alleged from any quarter. While, therefore, I do not accept the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] I am not unwilling to vote that this inquiry shall be made in reference to all except Mr. Adams.

I prefer, however, to hold my resolution at least where it is and to accept along with it these specific amendments, so that if a general inquiry of this kind shall not be ordered by the House, we shall at least have the inquiry made in those cases in which there are distinct allegations. I yield now to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to offer the following amendment as an addition to the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK:]

And whereas it is charged by a member of this House that J. Proctor Knott, who claims a seat as member from the fourth district of Kentucky, was disloyal to the Government of the United States during the rebellion: Therefore,

Be it further resolved, That the credentials of Mr. Knott be also referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire into such disloyalty, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before accepting that amendment I will say that I am informed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] that he has prepared a resolution which will perhaps meet the object better than mine, and I will yield to him for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the two cases covered by the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] there are two other cases of remonstrance against the swearing in of members claiming to be from Kentucky. One is the case of Hon. Lawrence S. Trimble, to which the attention of the House has already been called. The remonstrance has been presented to the House and reference has been made to the testimony in the case. That case of Mr. Trimble is one that I propose to embody in the amendment which I offer for the acceptance of the gentleman from Ohio. But there is still another case standing upon the precise ground of the case of Mr. Trimble. It is the case of John Young Brown. His seat is contested by Samuel E. Smith, who has sent forward to the proper officer the testimony taken in the contest, and who also remonstrated against Mr. Brown being sworn in, and who furnished the affidavits which I hold in my hand in addition to the testimony taken in the case, as a reason why John Young Brown should not be sworn in, and why his case should take the same direction as the cases of these other gentlemen, be referred to the Committee of Elections and reported upon by them.

Now, I offer a resolution precisely like that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] except that it embodies the two cases of Lawrence S. Trimble and John Young Brown. I also send to the Clerk's desk, with the resolution, the affidavits in the case of John Young Brown, which have not yet been read, and which, I think, should be read to the House. Accompanying these affidavits is a letter of Mr. Brown, dated April 18, 1861, referred to in the affidavits as being a letter which Mr. Brown had, in speeches made by him, acknowledged to be a letter written by him, and by which he still stood.

The Clerk read the resolution offered by Mr. PAINE, as follows:

Resolved, That Lawrence S. Trimble and John Young Brown, claiming to be members-elect of this House from the State of Kentucky, be not permitted to be sworn in as such members; but that the credentials of said Lawrence S. Trimble and John Young Brown, together with the protests of G. G. Symes and Samuel E. Smith, and of other citizens of said State, and the accompanying affidavits, be referred to the Committee of Elections; and that the said committee be instructed to investigate and report on the charges and facts of the case; and whether said Trimble and Brown are entitled as loyal citizens to seats in this House; and that the committee have power to take testimony, and for that purpose to send for persons and papers.

The Clerk also read the following:

[From the Louisville Courier, May 15, 1861.]

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editor Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph which appeared in your paper of this date:

JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South:

"I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government, and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks."

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the confederate States. What I did say was this:

Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto the death, and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them, he ought, and I believe will be, shot down before he leaves the State.

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm; as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered publicly and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully, JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Muhlenberg, ss:

On this 26th day of June, A. D. 1867, before me, a justice of the peace in and for the county and State above named, personally appeared M. J. Roark, who, being by me duly sworn according to law, on his oath doth say that he is a resident of Greenville, county and State above named; and further, that he was present at Morgantown, State of Kentucky, on the 10th day of April, 1867, and heard John Young Brown, in a public speech, declare and avow that he was the author of a letter charged to have been written by him, a copy of which letter is herewith filed, marked B, and made part of this affidavit.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Muhlenberg, ss:

On this 26th day of June, A. D. 1867, before me, a justice of the peace in and for the county and State above named, personally appeared E. G. Neel, who, being by me duly sworn according to law, doth on his oath say that he is a resident of Greenville, State of Kentucky; and further, that he was present at Greenville, State aforesaid, on the 8th day of April, 1867, and heard John Young Brown, then a candidate for Congress in this second congressional district, in a public speech, declare and avow that he was the author and responsible for a letter charged to have been written by him in 1861, which letter is filed herewith as part of this affidavit, and marked B. He also stated that in same public speech he had said nothing in said letter that he was not prepared to defend on that day—viz., 8th day of April, 1867. He further admitted in same speech that for something said or done by him (Brown) he was in the year 1865 arrested by order of Colonel Sam. Johnson, of Seventeenth Kentucky volunteer cavalry, and confined in jail or prison.

E. G. NEEL.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, by E. G. Neel, this 26th day of June, 1867.

JOHN M. WILLIAMS,

Justice of the Peace.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] refers to the case of Knott, and that of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] to the cases of Trimble and Brown. I accept both those amendments, to be appended as separate resolutions to the one which I offered.

Mr. LOGAN. I observe that the disposition of the House is to have a great many resolutions in connection with this case, but finally I think our action will embrace all the names. There seems to be an idea that there must be specific charges against each individual. Whether that is more definite than a charge against the whole is something for other gentlemen to determine. I do not know that there are any charges against Mr. Grover or Mr. Jones, except the general charge made in my resolution against the whole delegation. I will state, however, for the benefit of the House, so that some other gentleman may, if he chooses, draw a resolution to include their names, I do not propose to do so myself, that those two gentlemen were imprisoned during the war for disloyalty.

Mr. PILE. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PILE. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois. I move to amend the substitute as follows:

Insert after the words "all the members-elect from Kentucky," the following: "Except George M. Adams, member-elect from the seventh district, in regard to whose election no such allegations are made."

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to accepting that amendment as a modification of my resolution, inasmuch as I believe there are no charges against that gentleman. I, however, introduced my resolution for a different purpose from that of attacking any individual. My purpose was to test an important question in this House. There seems, however, to be some nervousness on this subject, and I will therefore accept the amendment and modify my resolution so as to include all the persons claiming seats as Representatives from the State of Kentucky, except the gentleman named in the amendment. I believe there have been charges made against all the others, except one, and he was the partner of John C. Breckinridge in the practice of the law. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Having now admitted all the amendments which gentlemen have desired to offer, I was about to call the previous question; but the gentleman from Illinois on the other side [Mr. MARSHALL] has asked for ten minutes, which I feel disposed to accord to him.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but a short time, probably not even the few minutes allotted to me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio. In the remarks I shall make, the time being limited, I shall not attempt to answer any of the party allusions or references to party made by the other side of the House. It seems to me a question of this gravity ought to be approached in a different spirit from that which has been manifested here. If possible, it ought to be calmly and dispassionately considered, and solely with reference to the important rights and grave principles involved. I was sorry to hear one of my colleagues remark that he would do all in his power here and elsewhere to continue and perpetuate the Republican party. I believe gentlemen on questions of this kind ought not to permit themselves to be influenced by considerations of that character.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have but a short time, and my friend must excuse me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me put myself right. I understand my colleague yields to me for an explanation. He does me injustice, not intentional, I hope, nevertheless injustice, and if I suffer it to go without correction I will be taken as acquiescing in it. I did say I would do here and elsewhere all I legally and rightfully can to continue the Union party in power. I did not mean without reference to the rightfulness of the case, without regard to the legality of the action, but simply what I can do rightfully and legally here and elsewhere I will do to maintain the Union party.

Mr. MARSHALL. I know the gentleman qualified it by using the word "legally," but, sir, notwithstanding this qualification, the remarks of my colleague, taken altogether, lead to the inevitable conclusion that he would not be at all scrupulous as to the means resorted to for the purpose of preserving the ascendancy of the Republican party. I have no doubt all honest men think or feel that the preservation of the principles of their party will promote the best interests of their Government; that the safety or welfare of the Union is identified with it; but that is no reason why any patriotic man, any Representative upon this floor should resort to anything not warranted by the Constitution and laws of the country to continue and perpetuate any party on earth. The existence of our country, its salvation, does not depend on any party. All parties become in course of time corrupt, and it becomes necessary for the people for their own safety to rise in their majesty and throw off their yoke. When a party gets to be in an overwhelming majority it necessarily becomes corrupt. Such has been the experience of the world from its foundation to the present time.

In my judgment the American people are rapidly coming to the conclusion that we have arrived at that time in the history of the Republican party, especially when we hear upon the floor of the Federal Legislature the declaration that everything, the most sacred and holiest rights, are to be sacrificed to secure its perpetuation. The opinion is gaining strength everywhere; the people in the remotest corners of the Republic are awakening to the fact that in this unholy struggle to retain power the Republican party has sacrificed not only its own professed principles and the material interests of the country, but that it is also trampling ruthlessly and wantonly upon the Constitution, and crushing out every safeguard by which public and private liberty are to be protected and preserved. In the treatment of the lately rebellious States every principle taught by the sages of the past, every construction of our Federal Constitution heretofore made, whether strict or latitudinarian, every principle of free government, have been disregarded, and the country kept oscillating between anarchy and despotism in the struggle of this party to continue its existence. And it is now evident that it will never consent to a restoration of the Union until by the introduction and manipulation of the negro vote and the disfranchisement of our own race it can degrade the excluded States into mere dependencies of the radical faction.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him the same question I asked the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MARSHALL. Let it be brief.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. In the case of a man who has been elected to Congress, who has been a member of the confederate congress, who is beyond all doubt a rebel, would he, in the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, be disqualified from sitting here?

Mr. MARSHALL. In the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, so long as there is any loyal disqualification it is within the power of the House to prevent such a man taking his seat. I do not doubt the power of the House, when a gentleman appears to take his seat as a member, to suspend the taking of the oath in order to inquire into and determine his right to such seat; but this power should be exercised with the greatest caution and with a due sense of the gravity of the step taken, and the tendency of such precedent and such action to destroy representative government itself.

In the hands of a reckless or unscrupulous majority this power is of the most dangerous character. By its exercise not only districts, but whole States may be deprived of all representation indefinitely. The safer and better general rule unquestionably is, in all cases to permit every one to take his seat immediately, who comes with duly certified evidence of his election, and, it should be a very extreme case, indeed, that would justify a departure from it. I do not think any such case appears against any one of the gentlemen claiming seats from the Commonwealth of Kentucky. These ex parte charges and affidavits should be regarded with great suspicion. It would be no difficult matter to get up similar charges against any gentleman on this floor, and parties presenting them should be driven to the regular and ordinary mode of contesting the seat of a member, and the onus of proof and expense of the contest should be thrown upon the person testing.

The right of representation is a holy and sacred right, and its destruction is the destruction of the Constitution and the Government itself, and it ought not to be interfered with except upon the gravest consideration.

In regard to this proposition concerning the members from Kentucky I cannot go into detail. My colleague first upon the floor did that State great injustice. I do not charge that it was intentionally done. He characterizes Kentucky as a rebel State. Why, sir, during the whole war she had her Representatives here and in the Senate. It is not true that large sections or any district in Kentucky claimed only representation at Richmond in the confederate congress during the war. That there were many secessionists in that State is undeniable, and that a portion of these assembled together on the southern border of the State and professed to hold an election for Senators and Representatives. But this was nothing more than an illegal, unauthorized assemblage, and had no connection whatever with the government of the State. That government was at all times loyal, and the entire State was during the whole war represented in both branches of Congress, and her Representatives cooperated with those from all other sections in maintaining the dignity and honor of the country.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him in one remark very briefly?

Mr. MARSHALL. I will yield for a correction only?

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman is certainly mistaken in reference to the history of Kentucky. I can inform him that at Russellville, Kentucky, in November, 1861, a provisional government was organized, a legislature chosen, senators and representatives elected to the rebel congress. George W. Johnson, first Governor, was killed at Shiloh. In September, 1862, at Frankfort, R. Hawes was inaugurated Governor of Kentucky; while Bragg, Kirby Smith, and Humphrey Marshall's rebel forces occupied the whole State except a few posts on the Ohio river. R. Hawes held this position until the war ended, and is now a judge of a State court in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. MARSHALL. There never was an authorized rebel government in Kentucky. There was a squad of rebels got together, as I have before stated, and being very anxious to get members for the confederate congress, they made up something that they pretended to call senators and representatives of Kentucky, and these were received at Richmond; but there never was any election of members thereto under any law of the State, as is well known.

There is imminent danger, Mr. Speaker, in establishing such a precedent as is about to be established here. It is the easiest thing to get up charges against any man. I will not undertake to inquire now whether these charges or any of them are true or not. I do not know any of these gentlemen, except one, the member from Paducah, whom I have known for a long time as a neighbor and as a high-minded and honorable gentleman, and in regard to whom I must say that I am confident that every charge made against him here is utterly and entirely false. But I do not propose to go into the discussion of that question. I only suggest now how easy it is to get up charges of this character against any one. There has been great excitement in my own State during the last few years, great party excitement, and charges were made in the most reckless manner, groundless charges, too, against nearly all the public men of the State. I have no doubt my colleague [Mr. LOGAN,] if he should see proper to do so, could get affidavits that I or any gentleman of my political views was disloyal and an enemy of the Government of our country. And on the other hand I could get abundance of affidavits that my colleague was during the first months of the war more bitterly and openly opposed to its prosecution than any other public man of the State of any party. I should certainly, however, prefer no such charges against him for the purpose of affecting his right to his seat, or for any other purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. Will my colleague state on this floor that he can get charges against me of that character which he would believe?

Mr. MARSHALL. I am not going into that. The course of my colleague in entering the Army and fighting as he did would forbid it.

Mr. LOGAN. If there are any such charges I want them made specific.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the gentleman had erred in his judgment at the commencement of the contest, if his position had been just the reverse of what it is now, his course during the progress of the war would forbid my presenting any charges of that kind against him on this floor. I have great respect for the gallantry and manhood of my colleague, however much I may disapprove what I regard as his grave, political errors, and I would do no injustice to him. But I must say, as he calls on me, that at the commencement of the war it was my belief that he was more hostile to its prosecution than ever I was even charged or thought by any one to be during its entire continuance. That is my belief; but I certainly should not have stated it had I not been called on to do so.

But I find that I have been diverted from the train of remarks I had proposed making when I arose, and as the time allotted me is about exhausted, I will add but a word or two more. The resolution offered should not be adopted for another reason: it is an entire abandonment of our statute law in regard to contests. It proposes not only to vacate these seats indefinitely, but to throw the burden and expense of a contest upon the Government and the committee of the House instead of upon the parties contesting. Our statute in regard to contesting elections should be wiped from our statute-books if this precedent is to be established. Neither notice nor any other formality of contest need hereafter to be observed, and all burdens are removed from the shoulders of contestants. It will be a glorious precedent for defeated politicians.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the House will not consider me as asking too much when I now demand the previous question on the resolution and pending substitute.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman allow me a few minutes?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will allow the gentleman five minutes of my remaining thirteen, but I cannot yield to anybody else.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to answer any of the arguments on this question, but only to state a distinction which I think can very well govern this House and enable it to act safely in the decision of the question. I think we are justified in taking this position: that when a member rises in his place and states as of his own knowledge or upon information worthy of belief that a person presenting himself here for a seat in this House is or has been substantially a traitor to this Government, we have a right to decline to allow that person to take the oath until that matter has been investigated and he has been relieved from the charge.

But I make a distinction between such an allegation against a gentleman presenting himself here and any other which can possibly be made, because it is an allegation which, if proved to the satisfaction of Congress, will be found to be very different from an allegation that in an election men were deterred from the exercise of the right of suffrage, or that some men voted who had no right to do so. These are allegations which may oftentimes be made by any member of Congress; but when it is alleged upon the authority of a member of this House or upon an affidavit presented and read by a member of the House, or by its Clerk, that a person presenting himself here for a seat is a traitor, of course we must refuse to allow him to take the oath until he is purged from that charge. It is upon that rule that I must vote upon the questions as they are presented. Whenever any member upon his own knowledge or upon affidavit will charge by name any one of these men presenting themselves as being identified with the rebellion, I cannot vote to allow him to take the oath; but I cannot vote to exclude men in gross and say that Kentucky or any other State, shall not be represented here because in the election men were overawed, or because persons voted who should not properly have voted.

I therefore trust that those gentlemen who have the management of this matter will make the charges specific against individuals, and, for one, I am prepared to vote to exclude them for the present from the privileges of this House.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to modify my resolution by striking out the words "all the," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Lawrence S. Trimble, John Young Brown, J. Proctor Knott, A. P. Grover, Thomas L. Jones, James B. Beck, and John D. Young," so that the resolution will provide that the credentials of Lawrence S. Trimble, John Young Brown, H. Proctor Knott, A. P. Grover, Thomas L. Jones, James B. Beck, and John D. Young, members-elect from the State of Kentucky, shall be referred to the Committee of Elections, for report at as early a day as practicable, and that, pending the report of the committee, none of said members-elect shall be allowed to take the oath of office or admitted to seats as such.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have concluded to allow myself one minute more. There has been a misapprehension in supposing that this is a movement against Kentucky as a State. That is not my idea of this case. If the same showing should be made in regard to a member from Ohio that he had been participating in the rebellion as a public enemy, upon allegations introduced here and sustained as are the allegations in this case, or upon the statement of any member upon this floor, I would apply the rule in the same way to him. I want that understood. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being first upon the substitute for the resolution offered by Mr. LOGAN.

Mr. WOOD. I move to lay the substitute on the table.

The SPEAKER. That would carry the whole subject to the table.

Mr. WOOD. Cannot I move to lay the substitute separately upon the table?

The SPEAKER. No; as it is connected with the resolution it will carry the whole subject to the table.

Mr. WOOD. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The substitute was agreed to—ayes 67, noes 50.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONNECTICUT ELECTION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the memorial of citizens of the fourth congressional district of Connecticut, charging W. H. Barnum, claiming to be Representative-elect to the Fortieth Congress from that district, with having procured his election by bribery, and protesting against his being permitted to hold his seat, with accompanying affidavits and proofs.

I have made no motion to exclude Mr. Barnum from taking the oath, but I move that the memorial and accompanying proofs be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to investigate and report, and with authority to take testimony and send for persons and papers.

I do this because it is not a case of contest; there is no contestant; it is a memorial from citizens of the district; and for fear that some gentleman this warm weather should rise to make a speech, I will demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the contested election of Columbus Delano vs. George W. Morgan, from the thirteenth district of Ohio; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House papers in the contested election of William F. Switzler vs. George W. Anderson, from the ninth district of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House papers in the contested election of James H. Birch vs. Robert T. Van Horn, from the sixth district of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House papers in the contested election of S. E. Smith vs. John Young Brown, from the second district of Kentucky; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a notice of contest in the case of Samuel McKee vs. John D. Young, claiming a seat as a Representative from the ninth district of Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

ADJOURNMENT OVER FOURTH OF JULY.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday next.

COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It being desirable that a committee on the subject of reconstruction should be appointed, I have consulted with several gentlemen as to whether we should revive the joint committee of fifteen or appoint a separate committee for this House. After consulting with my colleague on that committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and several Senators, they have all agreed that the most convenient method is for each House to appoint its separate committee. I therefore ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed to inquire what further legislation, if any, is required respecting the acts of March 2 and March 23, 1867, or other legislation on reconstruction, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to suspend the rules to permit the introduction of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to, (two thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was introduced.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] by adding thereto the following:

Resolved further, That a bill perfecting and strengthening the military reconstruction act, so-called, or otherwise providing for the establishment of civil government within the southern States, be reported and acted on as soon as practicable; that no proposition for general legislation be entertained during this session of Congress; and that all matters calling for such legislation be laid on the table without debate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the amendment, except the latter part in regard to general legislation, which seems to me somewhat objectionable. I am willing to accept all but that part.

Mr. ELIOT. Rather than accede to that proposition I would prefer to withdraw the amendment and offer it as a separate proposition.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Very well; that is the better way. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, there being—ayes seventy-three, noes not counted.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution of Mr. STEVENS was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a bill perfecting and strengthening the military reconstruction act, so-called, or otherwise providing for the establishment of civil governments within the southern States, be reported and acted on as soon as practicable; that no proposition for general legislation be entertained during this session of Congress; and that all matters calling for such legislation be laid on the table without debate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to use the words "other general legislation." Reconstruction is general legislation.

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the resolution.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Does not that resolution propose to change the rules of the House?

Mr. ELIOT. I propose to change the rules of the House by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Can the rules be suspended?

The SPEAKER. They are repeatedly suspended. They have again and again been suspended during this Congress. The whole book can be suspended.

Mr. DRIGGS. If that prevails, will it not keep out the report of the Committee of Elections on general matters of legislation? This is general legislation.

The rules were suspended, there being—ayes 90, noes 86; more than two thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer a resolution, which, I think, the House will approve of, to expedite business.

Mr. KELSEY. I withdraw my motion to hear the resolution.

EXECUTIVE INFORMATION.

Mr. JUDD. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, instructed to furnish for the use of the House of Representatives, copies of all instructions, orders, and correspondence relating to or in any way connected with the execution and administration of the act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the act supplemental thereto.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELSEY renewed the motion to adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

MEXICO.

Mr. COVODE. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to this House all the official correspondence between the Department of State and Hon. Lewis D. Campbell, late minister of the United States to the republic of Mexico, from the time of his appointment; also all correspondence of the Department with his successor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman to modify his resolution so as to direct the Secretary of State to furnish this information, and not call on the President to do it.

Mr. COVODE. The President is the proper person to be called on.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by making it directory upon the Secretary of State to furnish the information.

Mr. COVODE. It is proper to call upon the President. Events are transpiring in Mexico which make this necessary. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was disagreed to.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—AGAIN.

Mr. ELIOT. In the other branch a resolution of the same kind has been informally agreed to. I demand the previous question on my resolution.

Mr. JENCKES. I call the gentleman's attention to the latter part of the resolution. It ought to be "referred or laid upon the table."

Mr. ELIOT. I accept the modification.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to propound a question to the Chair, whether it is competent for the House to declare in advance by general rule it will not entertain any proposition submitted by any one of its members upon any legitimate question of legislation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer with pleasure. In the rules adopted by the House they do declare they will only receive certain propositions in certain ways at certain times.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. This is a proposition to entertain only one question during the whole session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. It is a rule adopted by the House, but, like any other, may be suspended.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Can a rule be established to override the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. HOLMAN. The same rule was adopted in 1861, at the July session.

Mr. ELIOT. I insist on the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BOYER. I ask for a division of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. At what point does the gentleman desire to have it divided?

Mr. BOYER. There are two propositions; one relates to legislation, and the other simply to the transaction of business.

The Clerk read the first part of the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a bill perfecting and strengthening the military reconstruction act, so-called, or otherwise providing for the establishment of civil government within the southern States, be reported and acted upon as soon as practicable.

Mr. BOYER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being taken on the adoption of the first part of the resolution, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the concluding part of the resolution, as follows:

That no proposition for other general legislation be entertained during this session of Congress, and that all matters calling for such legislation be laid on the table or referred without debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. On that I ask the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 19, noes 98.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, (less than one fifth voting in favor thereof.)

The question being taken on the second part of the resolution, it was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FLOGGING OF A CIVILIAN.

Mr. GETZ, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives such information as may have come into the possession of the Department relative to the flogging of a civilian, by order of Colonel Dodge, at Fort Sedgwick, for the alleged offense of furnishing a bottle of whisky to soldiers, who, in citizen's dress, applied to him for the same; and that the Secretary of War be also requested to inform the House under what law of the United States, or article of war, if any, the said punishment was ordered to be inflicted.

VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein named; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed, and printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote just taken.

The motion was entered on the Journal.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, the papers in the case of P. G. Pearson, asking for a pension, was withdrawn from the files of the House.

ABSENT MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER announced that he had been requested by Mr. PRUYN to state that he was compelled by business to be absent at the commencement of the present session, but would be present on Saturday or Monday next.

Mr. ELIOT stated that a telegram had been received from his colleague, Mr. DAVES, saying that he had left home for Washington, but had missed the train.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BAKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill explanatory of an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, &c.; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the select committee of nine when appointed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. CAKE: The petition of enlisted men of the Army detailed as clerks at headquarters, department of Missouri, praying for additional pay.

By Mr. COBB: The memorial resolution of the Wisconsin Editors' and Publishers' Association, for the repeal of duties on printing paper.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of William H. Cloud, praying a pension for disability occasioned by his military services in the late war for the Union.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Jonas Preston, a sailor of the war of 1812, asking for a pension.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 5, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, Chaplain for the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The Journal of Wednesday last was read and approved.

Hon. J. W. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, appeared in his seat.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 130) construing the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," passed March 23, 1867; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, pursuant to the practice of the day before yesterday, that the bill be printed and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee appointed to wait upon the President, and to inform him that the two Houses had formed a quorum and were ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make, have attended to the duty imposed upon them by the Senate, and the President replied that he had no communication to make at present.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the business of this session should be confined to removing the obstructions which have been, or are likely to be, placed in the way of the fair execution of the acts of reconstruction heretofore adopted by Congress; and to giving to said acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed; and that further legislation at this session, on the subject of reconstruction or on any other subjects, is not expedient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator to strike out the word "should" at the beginning of the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept that amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator press the adoption of that resolution to-day?

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask its present consideration if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I will not object to its consideration to-day, because I would not needlessly throw any barrier in the way of its consideration.

Mr. GRIMES. Then it is under consideration, if there be no objection to it.

Mr. SUMNER. But at the proper time I shall have something to say about it, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Before a resolution of such importance, so open to criticism, so doubtful in point of order, so plainly contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, is brought under consideration, I do think that the Senator who brings it forward should enlighten us in regard to its object, and the reasons in justification of so extraordinary a proposition. I really appeal to my friend to be good enough to let us know the reasons for such a proposition.

Mr. ANTHONY. I supposed the reason for this proposition was so evident to every Senator who has conversed with the members of the body that it would require no explanation whatever. We adjourned at the first session of the Fortieth Congress under a resolution which was read at the desk yesterday, which contemplated a session in July, provided the Senators and Representatives, acting upon their individual judgment, should come here in sufficient numbers to form a quorum, and in the event that a quorum was not formed in both Houses then the Presiding Officers were directed immediately to adjourn the two Houses without day. A quorum would not have assembled had it not been thought that some amendment was necessary to the reconstruction law. I do not state this as an opinion; I state it as a fact within my own knowledge. There were thirty-five Senators answered to their names on Wednesday. More than eight Senators have told me that they should not have come here but for that reason. I believe, Mr. President, that we have come here in obedience to the public sentiment of the country. I think that the public sentiment of the country demanded that there should be some legislation in order to make the reconstruction acts precisely what we intended them to be, and not as they have been construed, I do not say improperly, for I am not a lawyer and do not pretend to judge upon that, by the Attorney General. Whether the construction is a perfectly fair one, or whether it is a technical one, it certainly does not give to those acts the intention which Congress had in passing them; and I believe the country demanded that we should come here and make those acts as we intended them and as they received the very general approbation of the entire country. I think that the same sentiment which required us to meet for this purpose requires that we should confine ourselves to that object. I think it would be very disastrous to the business of the country if we should now take up the questions of tariff and of finance and of currency. I believe it would be disastrous to the political interests of the country, which, in my judgment, are identified with the interests of the dominant party in this Chamber, if we should go into the discussion of general political questions. The resolution which is now before the Senate has been, by a similar one in the House of Representatives, passed by so large a majority that the opponents of it could not call the yeas and nays. I suppose it is not improper to make a reference to that, showing that it is the sentiment alike of the House as I believe it to be of the Senate; and I have offered this resolution supposing that it would command the approbation of a very great majority of the body.

Mr. SUMNER. Listening to my friend carefully, he will pardon me if I say I did not understand that he assigned any real reason why the Senate should not proceed with the consideration of business, positively requiring attention. I did not understand him to assign any reason.

Mr. ANTHONY. It must have been my fault; I did not make myself clearly understood.

Mr. SUMNER. I understood the Senator to say that we should not begin to consider matters of finance and of tariff. I did not understand the Senator to go beyond that.

Mr. ANTHONY. All political legislation.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; then I understand the limitations of the Senator. May I ask the Senator why he has not introduced those limitations into his resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know of any other subjects that could be brought forward except finance, tariff, currency, and general political legislation. I think that includes everything; and the legislation in regard to the amendment of the reconstruction act is especially excepted. I intended that it should exclude everything else. If I have not done so, my friend from Massachusetts, who is so much better able than myself to draw a technical resolution, can suggest an amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. If I can have the attention of my friend, I believe that he will be satisfied that he has made a mistake in presenting any such resolution. Meanwhile I send to the Chair a substitute. I move that all after the word "resolved" be stricken out, and what I now offer be inserted instead:

That the Senate will proceed, under its rules, to the dispatch of the public business requiring attention, and to this end all petitions and bills will be referred for consideration to the appropriate committees without undertaking in advance to limit the action of Congress to any special subject and to deny a hearing on all other subjects.

I object to the proposition that has been introduced by my friend from Rhode Island, and which I cannot but think he has introduced hastily and without sufficient consideration, or at any rate under influences which I think his own better judgment should have rejected. I am against it on several grounds. If I said it was contrary to precedent, I should not err; for the attempt that was made the other day to show that there was any precedent to sanction such a proceeding, it seems to me, signally failed. Our attention was then called to a resolution adopted at a session of Congress convened by the President of the United States for a declared purpose, announced at the time in advance. I think that even the course that Congress took was regarded as questionable; but the two cases are different. The present session is not in its character like that. It is a continuing session of a Congress begun on the 4th day of March last. It is simply a prolongation of that session; and the practical question is, whether you will undertake to limit the business of Congress in a general session called under a statute of the United States. Clearly there is no precedent for any such proceeding. You plunge into darkness without a guide.

But I go further, and I say that, even if there were a precedent, I would reject it, for I prefer much more to follow the Constitution of my country. I will not say that the text of the Constitution positively forbids the proposition of my friend from Rhode Island; but I do insist that the spirit of the Constitution is against it. How often in other times have we all throbbed with indignation at the resolution passed in the other House, ay, also in this Chamber, to stifle discussion on certain questions. You do not forget the odious rule, which went by the name of the "gag," and it had attached to it the name of its author, which began with the letter "A." I hope there will be no other gag of a larger character introduced on this occasion to be classified with the letter A. That was justly offensive, because it violated the right of petition; but you propose now not only to interfere with the right of petition, but also with all possible measures concerning the public welfare, except as they may relate to one single matter, and that viewed in its narrowest relations.

I object to such a proposition as in its spirit unconstitutional. I appeal to my associates to reject it that it may not pass into our history as a tyrannical precedent of evil example to be employed against freedom. You may see, sir, how obstructive it will be if you will glance at certain matters which have come within my own knowledge, and which I submit it is our duty now to consider, and my duty as a Senator to press upon your attentions. No relations that I may have with any political associates can absolve me from responsibility.

Every Senator doubtless has within his own knowledge business which he thinks deserves attention at this moment; other business which he does not doubt must be acted on. There are Senators on the other side of the Chamber who will plead the cause of the frontiers now menaced by the Indians. I have heard something of that peril from chance travelers there during these few weeks past; and yet by the proposition of my friend from Rhode Island we are to abandon the frontiers, and I know no other reason than that the weather is too hot. Ay, it may be hot in this Chamber, but it is hotter there. The reports from the frontiers show that danger has begun. The sound of the war-whoop has broke even into this Chamber. The corpses of your fellow-countrymen are lying unburied on the roadside, and their memories haunt you. And yet you fold your hands and decline to supply the needed protection. This will not do.

There are matters which come within my own personal knowledge from the business that is before the committee with which I have the honor to be connected. There is a treaty with the Government of Venezuela, in South America, which has been ratified since we left these Chambers a few weeks ago, and after much delay, under which citizens of the United States have important interests. Will you leave those interests without any provision because it is hot? A statute is needed in order to provide the means for carrying that treaty into execution. It creates a mixed commission in order to audit and consider certain claims upon that Government. My attention has been called to it by the late minister of the United States in a letter now in my hand, dated at New York the 3d day of July, and which I have received since I had the honor of addressing the Senate Wednesday last. I refer to Mr. Culver, who calls my attention particularly to this treaty and the importance of immediate action with regard to it by Congress. He says:

"Many of the claimants have been delayed thirty years and more in getting their claims adjusted. Some of the witnesses are old and likely to die. It is all important to these claimants that the commission be organized as soon as may be and enter on its work. It is limited, by the terms of the treaty, to twelve months. If Congress make no appropriation for it the commission will not be appointed till winter; thus delaying the whole matter."

Here are ancient claimants, long delayed and now looking to you for aid; not improperly, for it is their right.

So much for the treaty of Venezuela. And yet the proposition of my friend from Rhode Island, if adopted, will cut off these claimants from the aid which you owe them at this time.

Then comes another treaty, to which I refer also, because the ratifications have been exchanged, and it has been proclaimed by the President of the United States. I mean that important treaty by which the Emperor of Russia has ceded to the United States all his possessions on the North American continent. The ratifications were exchanged only about a fortnight ago. Yesterday, the 4th of July, I received a call from the minister of Russia, who put in my hand a cable dispatch which came to him yesterday from St. Petersburg, announcing that on the day before the Russian commissioner had left St. Petersburg for Washington to make the formal surrender of that vast region to the United States. To my inquiry when the commissioner would arrive, the minister replied, "In one fortnight." In one fortnight, then, final proceedings will be had for the establishment of your jurisdiction over that immense region, and two questions now arise: first, your duty to complete the contract by which you are bound in consideration of the cession to pay $7,200,000; and, secondly, your other duty to provide a proper government for this immense region. But the proposition of my friend from Rhode Island would exclude these important topics from our consideration. We are not to look at them; the weather is too hot!

Mr. ANTHONY. I said nothing about the weather.

Mr. SUMNER. A very eminent French writer says that all his most important ideas are to be read between the lines; and so, as I listened to the speech of my friend from Rhode Island, I felt really that his important ideas were left unsaid; he had in his mind all the time the hot weather.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me, I should really think, from the reply which he has made to my speech, that he has been replying to what he thinks I might have said, but did not say. I said nothing at all about the hot weather. I think it very unworthy of this body to take into consideration the personal convenience of Senators. If the public business demanded that they should remain, I hope no Senator, however inconvenient it might be, would refuse to do so. I would stay here until December if I thought the public business demanded that we should stay here.

Mr. SUMNER. But I ask my friend if he is not in favor of carrying out the treaty which has already been ratified?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will be time enough to do that at the next session.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is impossible to do that, because the House of Representatives have already decided that they will not take up that business, and we cannot do it alone.

Mr. SUMNER. One of the Senators about me says "it will be time enough to do that at the next session," and the other says "it is impossible to take it up, because the House have already provided otherwise." How does the Senator know it? Let the Senate proceed to do its duty, throwing its responsibility upon the House if it chooses to neglect the business.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would the Senator have the Senate originate an appropriation bill?

Mr. SUMNER. I would have the Senate originate a bill for the government of this territory, and if need be, originate a bill for the payment of the money due. There is no objection in the Constitution to that.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has never been done.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; it has been done again and again.

Mr. ANTHONY. An appropriation bill originated in the Senate?

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I never knew that to be done but once, and then the House rejected it, refused to consider it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator refers to what are called the general appropriation bills. The Senate constantly makes appropriations for individual cases and for carrying out treaties. Does it not appropriate for private claims? for salaries? for other obligations? In principle, the present case does not differ from an appropriation for an estate adjoining the Capitol. It is an estate adjoining the Capitol; but it is to be paid for.

Now, that I may make this still clearer, I beg to call attention to the very words of the treaty with Russia, which I have in my hands. By article four it is provided, as follows:

"His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias shall appoint with convenient dispatch an agent or agents for the purpose of formally delivering to a similar agent or agents appointed on behalf of the United States, the territory, dominion, property, dependencies, and appurtenances which are ceded as above, and for doing any other act which may be necessary in regard thereto; but the cession, with the right of immediate possession, is nevertheless to be deemed complete and absolute on the exchange of ratifications, without waiting for such formal delivery."

So that by terms of the treaty on the exchange of ratifications, you became the possessors of this jurisdiction; and now by the approaching surrender, through an official agent, your jurisdiction will be consummated. With this jurisdiction will be corresponding responsibilities. You must govern the territory; you must provide protection for the property and the other interests there. Already, by the telegraph, we learn that a large ship is about to leave San Francisco, for Sitka, with merchandise of all kinds. There is also the immense fur trade, which has been the exclusive Russian interest there ever since the discovery of the country, all of which will be left open, without any regulation, unless you interfere by appropriate law. There is that most important fur, which was the origin of wealth on that whole northwestern coast, the sea otter, which will be exposed to lawless and destructive depredation unless the Government supplies some regulations. Will you not do something? Will you leave these interests without any care? This will not do.

It is said that they may be considered next winter. Do not forget the distance between Washington and that far away region; you will then see how long you postpone the establishment of your jurisdiction. Months after Congress meets next December must elapse, leaving this region absolutely without any congressional government. There should be no delay; you should proceed at once; you certainly will not show yourselves worthy to possess this country unless you provide at once a proper government. If you leave it a prey to lawless adventure you will only increase the difficulties of dealing with a region so vast and so remote.

But there is another obligation still. You receive the territory: you ought to pay the money at the same time. A Senator before me cries out, "It will not be appropriated at this session."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not due yet.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it is not due yet. I ask the Senator's attention to the point. I understand as a matter of history in this negotiation that while it was proceeding it was proposed that the payment should be on the exchange of ratifications, so that when the cession was completed the transaction on our part should be completed also; but as the treaty was about being drawn up it was understood that there would be no meeting of Congress before next December, while the ratifications might be exchanged before that time. To meet this case a special provision was introduced extending the time of payment to a period of ten months from the exchange of ratifications. This explains the article which I will now read:

"In consideration of the cession aforesaid the United States agree to pay at the Treasury in Washington, within ten months after the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, to the diplomatic representative or other agent of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias duly authorized to receive the same, $7,200,000 in gold."

By the letter of the treaty as it stands you may if you see fit postpone the payment to ten months from the exchange of ratifications; but I submit to the Senator from Vermont whether he is willing to do so; whether, since the transaction has been consummated on the part of Russia, he is not willing—nay, desirous also—that it shall be consummated also on the part of the United States in the spirit of the original negotiation? I submit this as a question of sound policy—I will not say of integrity, but simply of sound policy on the part of our Government—a Republic representing republican institutions, by whose conduct republican institutions are always to be judged. Surely you will not fail to protect the national honor; nor will you stick at the letter of the treaty. The money should be paid at once.

I have alluded to two important matters arising under treaties which now require the attention of Congress. But there is still another which is more important than any treaty or any appropriation, which dwarf treaties and dwarf appropriations, which is not less important certainly than the protection of your frontier, now menaced by the Indians. I refer to a whole region of our Republic, embracing two extensive States, now menaced by a foe more dangerous to the national peace and welfare than any tribe of Indians. These are the returning rebels in the States of Kentucky and Maryland. Provide against them. They are Indians within your jurisdiction. You have the power; you have the means. Give the ballot to the colored citizens in those States, as you have given it already to colored citizens in the rebel States, and you will have an all-sufficient protection against these intruders. Here is something to be done. Who doubts the power? Out of three fountains in the Constitution it may be derived. It is your duty, then, to exercise it. See to it that these States have a republican government. Fix in your statute-book an authoritative definition of a Republic. Enforce the two amendments of the Constitution—one abolishing slavery, and the other declaring the rights of citizens. Any delay on your part to exercise so clear a power is a failure of duty, and it becomes more reprehensible when we consider the perils that may ensue. Communicate, if you please, with Union citizens of those two States. Listen to what they say. Be taught by their testimony.

I have, for instance, a letter from an eminent citizen of Maryland, written from Baltimore the 1st of July, which concludes as follows:

"I will only add that the interest felt by the loyal people of this State in the passage of this bill cannot be overated."

Communicate with your late colleague upon this floor; that able and patriotic Senator, Mr. Creswell. Listen to his testimony. There can be no doubt that the Unionists, whether black or white, in Maryland require your protection. Give it to them. Do not leave them a prey to rebels. They are exposed in the same way in Kentucky. Here is a letter which I have from a distinguished citizen of that State, dated July 1, and I read these, out of many others, simply because they are the latest; they have come within a few hours. I read as follows:

"Hope you will be able to do good at the extra session, and extend and protect the rights of the freedmen, as they are sadly in need of it in Kentucky. Reconstruct us. This is the only loyal hope."

Such is the cry. Kentucky needs reconstruction, and it is your duty to provide it. Put it on an equality with the rebel States. Let her colored citizens enjoy the full-blown rights of citizens, and let the white Unionists there have the protection of their votes. You sent muskets once. Send votes now.

Now, you have on your table a bill entitled as follows: "To enforce the several provisions of the Constitution abolishing slavery, declaring the immunities of citizens, and guaranteeing a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to colored citizens." Pass this bill, and you furnish the needed protection in these semi-rebel States. Pass this bill, and you supersede all strife on this much vexed and disturbing question in other States of the Union. You at once bring to the elective franchise thousands of good citizens, pledged by their lives and inspired by their recently received rights to sustain the good cause which you have so much at heart. Do this. Help in this way the final settlement of the troubles of our country. Pass this bill of peace, for such it will be, giving repose in all the northern States, and in this way help to establish repose in all the rest of the country. And yet I am told that even this important measure is to be set aside. We are not to enter upon its consideration; we are not to debate it; we are not to receive petitions in its favor. Is this right? Is it not a neglect of duty? Is it not intolerable?

Mr. President, it is on these grounds that I object to this proposition. I might have objected to it in the first place as out of order, and asked the ruling of the Chair, not doubting how the Chair, inspired always by a generous love of human rights, must rule, not doubting that the Chair would say that a proposition of such a character was too closely associated with one of the most odious propositions of our history to deserve welcome at this time. I have raised no such question now, contenting myself, should this proposition unfortunately be adopted, with an opportunity of raising it hereafter on the presentation of individual propositions. I confine myself now to other objections. I object to it as a departure from sound usage; as contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, and as setting up an impediment and obstruction to the transaction of public business of an urgent character, which you cannot neglect without a neglect of duty. I ask you to provide for the execution of recent treaties with Venezuela and Russia; to assure protection to Unionists in Maryland and Kentucky, and to give peace to the country. Above all, do not make a bad precedent, to be quoted hereafter to the injury of the Republic.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. Under some circumstances I should be glad to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. There are some measures of public importance, I think, that ought to have the consideration of Congress at this session. Measures in reference to which there would be no public detriment in having them postponed, I think should be postponed. I do not know precisely how the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island will be construed, but from a conference with our friends here, and what I have seen of the sentiments of our friends in the country, I am confident that no general legislation should be entered into. Still I apprehend that there are some measures of most pressing importance that we cannot justify ourselves in resolving that we will not take up. I do not know but that under this resolution you might take up an appropriation bill to appropriate money for the expenses of the registration in the South, though I doubt that. The officers there are out of money, and cannot proceed with the measure to its final consummation without it, as I am told. And yet I do not know that under this resolution even an appropriation for that specific purpose could be passed.

But there are other measures of public importance that were omitted in the last Congress by mistake. We ordered certain things to be done, and did not make any appropriation to carry them into effect, and the public officers cannot obey the law of Congress for that reason. I apprehend that some measures of relief in that direction ought to receive the attention of Congress. If we can learn anything from what we have had in sessions past, and if there is no change—and I do not know of any—we may have to wait some ten days after we pass the bill that is provided for in the resolution before it can be made a law. I do not know but that the Senate propose to take a recess during those ten days, and go off on an excursion. I do not know really what business we can devote ourselves to under the resolution. I apprehend Senators will not feel like coming here and sitting still day by day and waiting for a message from the other end of the avenue. To pass the resolution, restricting business, severely as it is drawn, I think would embarrass the Senate and Congress, and subject us to some censure in the country. While I say this, I would not enter upon any legislation relating to anything not absolutely necessary by the public wants and necessities of the country. But to say that we will not do even that, I think will subject us, as I said, to censure, and may be what we shall ourselves regret. I know that we can suspend this rule if we adopt it; but it will not be likely to be suspended. I know it will take votes to suspend it, and those who passed it will not be likely to vote for its suspension.

Allusion has been made to the condition of things on the frontier. I am somewhat familiar with our disturbances there. I am one of those who believe that a war can be prevented by a little legislation. We never got any credit out of an Indian war yet. We prolonged one in Florida through two Administrations, and they both broke down in it, and it finally cost us, in those days of prudence and economy, $200,000,000. I never heard anybody bragging about that Florida war as having accomplished anything. You may have a war on the frontier now, and it may last as long and be as expensive as the Florida war, and you will wish after all that you could throw a shade over it and blot it out from the records and history of the country. You may do as you now do, send your soldiers out there, few in number, and they will coop themselves in a fort and be massacred, and one outrage heaped upon another; and yet I believe the civil department of this country, by some legislation which we might have, would prevent that whole war with all its consequences both of disgrace and of money.

Although that is my opinion, I feel embarrassed in voting against the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, because from conversation with our friends and the action of the other House I find the sentiment is to do absolutely nothing not contained in the reconstruction act of the last session with the amendment, not even improving upon that, which is the most remarkable feature of this resolution, that we shall not even improve, if we could, upon the reconstruction bill itself. If the House of Representatives should send us a bill, which is somewhat of an improvement upon the bills passed at the last session, we agree that if that measure was not in that bill we will not now put it in, shutting our eyes to improvement even, agreeing beforehand that we will not modify our previous action to make it any better. I would not, of course, introduce into a bill now anything vitally changing the policy that we have adopted, because our friends in the South have organized upon that policy; they are registering and reconstructing their States upon it; they are defending it. I would not show a fickleness on the part of Congress now to change it, and make another platform for them. Our friends throughout the northern and western States, too, have incorporated it into their platforms and their creed. I am for adhering to it; but at the same time I can see no reason why some slight improvement may not be made without changing it materially. There is no law passed by Congress, when you come to put it in practical operation, but what those who have the execution of it will point out some defects in it. Some have been pointed out to us in the reconstruction bill. Now, ought we not to take those suggestions and improve upon the old bill? And yet we provide in this resolution that if the thing was not provided for in the old bill it shall not be provided for now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, no.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island. While I am willing and anxious to have this session confined to what we come here for, while I would not travel an inch beyond that, excepting so far as the public necessity and exigencies required, still I desire to enter my protest against confining ourselves entirely to making perfect and complete what was contained simply in the legislation of the last Congress. I believe it is unwise. I do not know that it is unconstitutional. I do not suppose it is. I think we can regulate our own method of proceeding in our own way; but I think it is impracticable and unwise, and will subject us to censure, and that we ourselves shall regret it hereafter.

Mr. YATES. I have but a very few words to say on this subject. I desire that no action of mine and that no vote which shall be given shall commit me against any of the propositions which have been suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and I should like to enter my protest against what might seem to be an attempt on his part to place us as against the positions which he has assumed.

I am opposed to any legislation now except upon the matter for which we came together. We have our regular sessions for business. They are fixed in the Constitution. The times for our meeting and for our adjournments are fixed in the Constitution. At those regular sessions we attend to the regular business of the country, the necessary legislation for the whole country. But now, sir, we are assembled in special session for a special purpose. I will do the honorable Senator from Massachusetts the justice to say that he was opposed to any adjournment whatever; but he stood solitary and alone as being in favor of continuing the session for the consideration of general business.

Mr. SUMNER. And to watch the President—provide against the President.

Mr. YATES. You stood solitary and alone for a continuance of the session for general legislation. But, sir, I was for a special session for a special purpose. I believe I occupied the attention of the Senate in several speeches, which I hated to make at the time, because I believed that the President of the United States would not enforce the policy which had been adopted by Congress, because I believed he had in his heart a wicked and malicious purpose to thwart the legislation of Congress and to carry out what he termed his policy; and a few of us—none more ably than the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts—contended that we should keep ourselves in position to meet the President and to see that the policy which had been adopted by Congress was enforced and carried out.

I protest that the honorable Senator is no better friend than I am of the various measures that he has suggested. I even claim precedence of the honorable Senator; I introduced the first bill in the Senate for suffrage in every State, rebel as well as loyal. And now, because I propose simply to consider the object for which we were called together, and for which we hold a special session, am I to be considered, is it to go out before the country, that I am less in favor of that doctrine of suffrage everywhere, in every State, than the honorable Senator from Massachusetts? I am against the consideration of that policy now, because now is not the time. We said in our arguments when those bills were introduced that in two or three years our policy would be adopted by Congress. So it will; and I say we shall have no complete and final reconstruction until we impose upon every loyal State the same limitations that we propose to impose upon the southern States. But, sir, we cannot argue these questions now. We will carry that policy; it will triumph; it will be the congressional policy; we will have uniform suffrage by congressional action in every State, rebel as well as loyal; and it is the only way in which we can have equal and universal suffrage. But we must wait. That is a matter which will require the long days and nights of winter. We cannot undertake to discuss these questions now, oppressed as we are by the heat of midsummer and with a Senate only half full and restless, impatient, and indisposed to listen. When the time comes for this regular legislation, for this final act of reconstruction, we shall be able to put it through.

But, sir, I rose simply to say that in the action I may take now I am not committing myself against these great propositions, but I am for the measure for which I contended at the end of the last session. I believe that the President has, as we predicted he would do, attempted to frustrate the policy and the measures adopted by Congress. I believe that this called session is necessary; but that as we have to do is to make the laws which we passed, not more effectual—they were sufficiently so—but so to make them that even the astuteness and special pleas of lawyers and attorneys general cannot misconstrue their meaning. I am for this policy. Why? Because the Congress of the United States received the sanction of the American people in favor of its policy. It was a glorious policy. It was simple. The people understood it. They approved it North and South. The country was prospering under it. The whole South was reorganizing under it, and but for the intervention of the President we should have had reconstruction so far advanced by the close of the year that we should then have perhaps all the States in the Union. When all those States are in the Union again, then by the united vote of North and South we will establish that for which we have so long contended, universal suffrage in every State in the American Union.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say in regard to this matter of the protection of the frontiers which has been alluded to here to-day, that I went this morning to see the Secretary of War, and I asked him if he desired any legislation whatever in regard to that or any subject in his Department. He said he desired nothing whatever; they had everything they wished for except one thing, and that he proposed to send in on Monday, the estimates for carrying out our reconstruction measures in the South. They want a further appropriation of money for that purpose; but as regards legislation for the protection of the frontier or any other matters of public defense he asked nothing whatever. Therefore so far as that is concerned he asks nothing of us, and I do not know that anybody proposes anything in that regard.

Mr. SUMNER. I am obliged to my colleague for the statement he has made. I think it is an important contribution in the way of elucidating our duties. It shows the false alarm under which Senators are acting. Senators are afraid that there is to be a great deal of business suddenly thrown upon them unless they stop the way by a new rule of doubtful constitutionality. Now, my excellent colleague says that so far as the War Department is concerned, which he represents so well on this floor, there is nothing to be feared there, there is to be no excess of business there. I dare say other Senators may soothe the sensibilities of Senators in the same way, at the same time that they might confess in the honesty of their natures that there are certain interests that at least need discussion. I have called attention to two in connection with the Department with which I am associated on this floor, and where I think the Senate ought to act. I feel pained to think that there can be any doubt of their acting. When I see that they are declining to act from a fear that if they do it may open the door to some great flux of business which at this time it is not expedient for us to enter upon, I confess my astonishment, astonishment mingled with regret, for I do regret that under such circumstances you propose to establish such a precedent.

And now my friend from Illinois will pardon me if I say one word with regard to what he has said. He knows how I always listen to him, with what sympathy and attention, and how I honor his early devotion to a great cause. He was one of the first on this floor who discerned clearly that under the Constitution of the United States there could be no exclusion from suffrage on account of color. I remember well the coldness, not to say something more, with which his declarations on that important subject were received in certain quarters; and yet, as he sees now, they are going on to triumph. For myself, I do not doubt that under the Constitution of the United States, which contains no discrimination of color, any exclusion from the ballot-box on account of color is unconstitutional. I cannot doubt how a court properly inspired, not bred in the days of slavery, but having sucked in the vital atmosphere of liberty, would decide that question. To my mind, it is too clear for argument. Nothing can come out of nothing. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States to sanction any exclusion from rights on account of color. Where then, under that Constitution, do you get the power? Any one who finds it in the Constitution has first to find it in his own heart. It does not exist in the Constitution. It cannot exist legitimately in any law under the Constitution.

But now, since the courts of the United States so miserably fail us, since they do not set aside the interpretations which have been foisted upon that sacred instrument in derogation of its just principles, I insist that the Congress ought, at the earliest possible time, to come to the rescue. But there my excellent friend craves delay.

He says "wait." Ah, sir, we have waited several generations; and now as the time seems at hand, the Senator, who latterly has contributed so much to the glorious consummation says, "Wait a little longer." Ah, sir, pardon me if I say it, that was the least worthy speech that I ever heard from my eminent friend. He has always spoken nobly, grandly, beautifully, for human rights, and has come forward generously into the fore front. I know that he feels now as he always has felt; but I regret that he will not join now in pressing that important question to a decision. The country needs the decision. Our friends in these States need it. They crave your protection, they beseech it; and my excellent friend says "wait." He seems to believe that we may pass that law as some final cap-stone on some future Fourth of July, perhaps, to complete this edifice of reconstruction. No, sir; I regard it as a practical measure which we ought to pass at once. If I could I would pass it before I slept to-night. I would carry that beautiful remedy into Maryland and Kentucky, ay, into Pennsylvania—I hope my friend over there [Mr. BUCKALEW] is not disturbed—and into Connecticut and into Ohio, too. I would carry it into every State; so that where ever we looked in our country we might find every State with a republican government. Who is there now that will say that a State which excludes voters merely on account of color is a republican government? Is there any Senator that will aver that? He may aver that it has been so regarded; but is there any Senator, on his responsibility as a Senator, who will take that side of the proposition? If he takes it now, I know that his children hereafter will regret it.

Why then delay, especially why set up on your records a barrier to discussion? Welcome, at least, the discussion. There can be no harm in that. "Hail, holy light!" There can be nothing but joy and advantage in light, and yet Senators will by their votes absolutely cut off discussion on this important question; some of them, perhaps, desiring to avoid it entirely, others, like my excellent friend from Illinois, postponing it to be some future cap-stone of some great monument. No, sir; the question is too important; it ought to be considered at once. There is no business which should take precedence of it.

And that brings me to the proposition with which the Senator from Illinois began. He said that we had come together now for a special purpose. How can he say that? Who is authorized to say that? I find no authority for it. The Senator misunderstands the authority under which we are here. We are here by virtue of the Constitution of the United States and an act of Congress. That is our authority. The Constitution says:

"The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

Very well; by law they did appoint a meeting on the 4th day of March, and we are here now under that law, the present session being but a continuation or a prolongation of the session which was then begun. My friend, therefore, is mistaken in his view of the character of this session. We are therefore a Congress assembled by virtue of an act of Congress to consider all the public business.

Mr. YATES. I will ask the Senator whether he believes this session of Congress would have been called together if Congress had been assured that the President would fully carry out the military bills to which he has referred?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator asks me if I believed we should have had this session of Congress—

Mr. YATES. If Congress had had faith in the President and his good intentions to carry out the measures which were then adopted by Congress, not measures hereafter to be passed.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not believe Congress would have come together if they had had faith in the President. I believe that the meeting on the 4th of March had its origin in the want of confidence in the President. I believe my friend agrees with me in that.

Mr. YATES. Yes.

Mr. SUMNER. It was to counteract and watch the President that we met on the 4th of March. When the session which began on the 4th of March was about to adjourn, provision was made for the renewal of that session, or a continuation or a prolongation of it, if you may so regard it. I take it in the same spirit with the original enactment.

It was to provide against the President, and to do such other incidental business as the public interests might require. For one, I never had any real doubt that there would be a session on the 3d of July. I so stated on the floor at the time the resolution passed. I have so stated constantly since, and I have advised more than one gentleman connected with Congress, who was about to leave the country, not to leave it, because his post of duty was here. I believe that I have answered the question of my friend.

And now one word more, and I have done. I was speaking of the character of this session. We are assembled under an act of Congress and the Constitution. By the Constitution it is provided that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. That is all it can do. It may not annihilate proceedings; it may not forbid proceedings. It may provide rules for them; but it cannot, in a just sense, prevent proceedings. It is, therefore, that I submit that the resolution under consideration, if not positively unconstitutional, is contrary to the spirit of that instrument.

Mr. ROSS. I rise simply to correct a misapprehension which would naturally be created by the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts who sits nearest the Chair. [Mr. WILSON.] I also visited the Secretary of War this morning in connection with matters upon the frontier which have been introduced here; and was informed by him that it would be impossible to adopt the measures which we ask, and which we consider are essential for the preservation of the peace of that country, without further appropriations.

Mr. President, there is already a state of war in that country. It is not so much for the avoidance of war as for its suppression that we desire legislation. A war has existed there for some months, and the Army has shown itself, so far, utterly incompetent for its suppression. What we now want is authority from Congress for the raising of volunteers, men who understand the business for which they go out in that country, and not, as has been the case thus far, decimate the Army by constant desertions, and the carrying off of arms, horses, and entire equipments.

There is another matter, also, upon which legislation is very essential for the future preservation of peace in that country. We can never have peace there while the Indians roam over the Plains which are traversed by the two lines of communication now in progress of construction toward the mountains. What we desire is the removal of those Indians to sections of the country north and south of that district—a measure which cannot be done by the War Department, by the Indian Bureau, or by any other Department of the Government without the concurrence of Congress, without the specific action of this body. To do this, we must have, in a resolution like this, some latitude more than is granted. We do not wish to be cut off and our country kept in that harassed condition in which it has been for years without some prospect of relief.

I hope, therefore, that either the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, or something similar to it, will carry. I do not wish to tie up my hands to legislate upon only one specific subject, when there are so many which demand our earnest attention. I agree with the general public sentiment, that we should take up no matters of general legislation; that we should confine our action mainly to the matter of reconstruction upon which we are convened. But there are others, this among them, which is nearest to the delegation from my State, that are absolutely essential. The public opinion of that State is such that it is equivalent to an instruction, as imperative upon us as the vote of the Legislature could be, and it constitutes an instruction which we cannot disobey.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to say one word in connection with this subject. I have the honor to hold in this body the position of chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, and I think that I speak advisedly when I say that the people of this country engaged in those industrial pursuits which that committee represent would not be prejudiced by permitting their interests to stand as they are to-day without any further legislation. I believe that the industrial interests of this country, represented by its manufacturers, will be promoted by postponing all legislation in reference thereto until December. For my own part, occupying a position of such labor, as is known to Senators here, as the chairman of that committee, I do not wish to invite, during the warm days of hot July, the attendance of the people of this country who are interested in those subjects; and I hail with great delight the fact that they have postponed the consideration of those subjects until a later day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. ANTHONY, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. TIPTON and Mr. THAYER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska, on the left, [Mr. TIPTON.]

Mr. THAYER. I only rise to allude to a statement made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if I can get his attention.

Mr. TIPTON. I thought the Chair recognized me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I recognized the other Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. TIPTON.]

Mr. THAYER. I beg pardon.

Mr. TIPTON. I do not wish to be at all discourteous to my colleague; but as we are on this subject, and as his side of the Senate has had two speeches on it already from the neighboring State of Kansas, as a matter of course I feel a little tenacious that we on this side representing Nebraska should have an opportunity of saying one word. I do not wish the country to understand that Kansas has all the Indians that are West. I wish it had.

While I desire at all times to be able to concur, especially with that part of the Senate with which I am politically identified, in the passage of any resolution that seems to receive such universal favor as this does, yet I must admit that I am somewhat embarrassed in regard to voting for the original resolution; and it is, as the representatives from Kansas have already indicated, on account of the condition of the frontier. I have all faith in the Secretary of War and all faith in the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate as to their good and kind intentions toward us upon the frontier; and yet I do not believe that our present system of warfare is worth anything; and I mean more than is couched in that word "anything" when I utter it. It has done nothing for us on the frontier. For the last three years our people have been slaughtered every day, and this day, as it is now about the hour of half past one o'clock, undoubtedly has had its victims also. Every day on the frontier our people are massacred.

Under these circumstances we want some kind of relief. You ask me what. I tell you frankly I do not know; but I want any experiment, anything for a change. If I could wield the legislative power of this nation to-day I would so remodel the whole system that I would make it a high crime for any regular Army officer to cross the Missouri river for the next twelve months; I would offer a premium for savage Indian scalps; I would enlist the men of the frontier, whose lives are identified with the frontier, and I would fill a volunteer army by the frontiersmen themselves; I would appoint as commanders of that army the men who understand Indian warfare, if it is to be understood at all. Our present system is inefficient. We never have successfully combated with savages. We may worry them out by the power of this nation; but we want an experiment at relief of some kind.

Under these circumstances, therefore, I say emphatically that I am embarrassed in regard to voting for the original resolution. I do not desire to show myself captious on this subject, and will not sit silent; I will vote on one side of the question or the other. I never was non-committal in anything, and I will not consent to sit silent in my seat and not vote when an opportunity is given to vote. I propose, therefore, to vote; that is my business here; and as I cannot vote for the resolution, I shall vote against the resolution. And now, leaving the balance that I ought not to say—for probably I should not have said what I have in this latitude; it is true, however—I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say that I am in favor, and I suppose every Senator is in favor, of protecting the people of this country against Indians or anybody else that wars on them. I think the War Department has power enough to do that. If they desired anything, I should certainly wish to give it; and I certainly think that the Congress of the United States, in spite of this resolution, will be disposed to do anything for the protection of the lives of the people on the frontier if any plan can be devised.

But I am very sorry to hear the Senator come in here and talk about offering a reward for scalps. It seems to me, that is not the language to be used in this Christian and civilized country, and I am sorry to hear it. I will say to the Senator that that kind of talk which we have had on the frontier, and the declarations made in the public press and in some of the speeches there, tend in the country to carry the conviction that the blame is not all on the side of the Indians, that a portion of our own people are nearly as responsible as the Indians themselves for these outrages, and that the savage deeds of the Indians are but little more barbarous and against civilization than the utterances of some of our Christian countrymen. I think in this matter of dealing with the Indians we should be just to them; we should act as a Christian and civilized people. Every effort should be made to protect our own people against them, and to preserve the public peace; and I have no doubt that the War Department of the Government is laboring honestly to that end. I was exceedingly anxious, when it was suggested by some of our friends here that some legislation might be necessary in regard to the Indians, that we should do what we could for the protection of the frontier; and I went this morning to see the Secretary of War for no other purpose than to ask if he desired any legislation in any respect whatever, and he answered in the most emphatic manner that he did not.

Mr. TIPTON. The Senator undoubtedly understands me in this: that so far as tribes will be bound by treaty stipulations, we will act in the utmost fairness with them. The murderous tribes now plundering and desolating our frontier will be bound by no treaty. They have no faith to keep with us. They cannot be intimidated but by an exhibition of power. You cannot speak to them in regard to any of the inhumanities of life. You cannot utter to them one single word of Christian civilization. All is powerless but an exhibition of power on the part of this Government. Until you can cause them to fear and tremble in your presence, until you can make them feel your power, until they understand that you will deal with them just as they are dealing with you, you cannot save the lives of your women and your children on the frontier; and when it comes to that I would authorize war upon these savages that cannot be approached; I would save the lives of our Christian women. God help the country and the reputation of the country when any Senator is to stand in his place here and dare not be permitted to talk of the massacres, and worse than massacres, of the women of his constituency, and not talk about premiums on savage Indian scalps.

This subject is one of vast moment to the people of the frontier. I trust I understand the amenities of Christian society. I trust I understand something of Christian civilization. Why, certainly the light of Massachusetts has visited us long since upon that subject, and we are trying to practice Puritanism as best we may be able to apply it to practice even in the very far West. But come ye down to it and furnish the sons from your own fireside. I boast not of it; but my son has spent summers on that very frontier, and farther on than where the war wages to-day, and he informed me of the safety of his condition when he boasted that he had two companions with himself, and by burrowing in the earth it was thought probable that they could hold at bay a large number of savages until aid could approach them. Our people are in their cabins to-day; they are in their dirt-covered hovels to-day, and they are looking from their loopholes for some relief; and therefore I stand here proudly to vindicate the doctrine with regard to those Indians who can hold no faith with you—premiums, anything, paid in gold for those savages' scalps.

Mr. POMEROY. As the passage of this resolution—for I think it is to pass—may embarrass us, I move to postpone its further consideration, in order to take up a joint resolution which has just come from the House of Representatives. I want to pass that joint resolution, and it should be passed before this resolution is adopted. I, therefore, move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; that ought not to be passed without a reference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us act upon this first.

Mr. SUMNER. The motion of the Senator from Kansas is entirely right; for if you act upon this resolution and adopt it, as the Senator from Illinois is disposed to do, I believe you cannot act on the House resolution. Here is a resolution, as follows:

"That the thanks of Congress be tendered to Major General Philip H. Sheridan for his able and faithful performance of the duties of commander of the military district in Louisiana."

Now, if the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island is adopted, we cannot act on this joint resolution; it is out of order; you cannot thank General Sheridan.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg the Senator's pardon. There will not be a single Senator opposed to that resolution. It can be passed unanimously.

Mr. CONKLING. This resolution only applies to legislative business.

Mr. SUMNER. Is not this legislative business?

Mr. ANTHONY. But if it is, I apprehend, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the order can be suspended or rescinded for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has not resigned his right to the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not object to the interruption. I simply say that if this resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island is to pass, we ought to live up to it religiously. The fact that we can pass over it by unanimous consent is another reason why we should now postpone it. I expect to vote for the Senator's resolution; but still it is against my will. I expect to vote for it, and therefore I do not want to embarrass myself, and it is on that account that I want it laid aside informally until we can pass the joint resolution from the House. I do not suppose anybody wants to refer that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to its being laid aside informally; I object to its formal postponement.

Mr. POMEROY. No committee, I conclude, want to report on the subject of thanking General Sheridan. It is a general proposition which has passed the House and is before the Senate. I therefore move that the resolution under consideration be laid aside to consider that resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust that after this debate has proceeded until it is nearly exhausted, or ought to be nearly exhausted—two hours—we shall not postpone the consideration of it in order to take up another resolution, and then have this debate all over again to-morrow or at a subsequent hour of this day. We all understand perfectly well what is the spirit of the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. It is that business shall not be initiated in this House. I undertake to say that if the House of Representatives send us any bill, and a majority of this body are satisfied that it ought to pass, they will not consider themselves restrained by having passed this resolution from going on and passing that bill if they choose to pass it, and any action of the House of Representatives on a House bill as it comes in will be legally and logically a repeal, so far as that action takes place, of this resolution which we now have under consideration.

As to the joint resolution that comes here from the House, I have always believed that a compliment, if you desire to present it, carried a great deal more weight if you presented it after due deliberation than if you did it apparently on the spur of the moment and upon an impulse; and I apprehend that General Sheridan, if that resolution comes from a committee of this body who have taken the trouble to investigate the grounds upon which Congress sees fit to bestow this highest reward that can be bestowed upon an American officer and an American citizen, will regard it as a greater compliment than if we should take it up and pass it in the manner in which it is proposed to pass it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent to correct a clerical error in the resolution which I had the honor to present. The word "legislative" should have been inserted before the word "business" in the first line, so that it would read "no legislative business." That was in the original draft of the resolution, but in the copying it was left out by mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there can be no object whatever in passing the resolution of thanks now. All our rules and all our orders are subject to suspension by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except in those cases where it is provided to the contrary in the rules themselves; and I presume such a resolution would not be objected to by any Senator; and in spite of this order, if there be any business of such pressing necessity that it will pass the Senate unanimously, of course the rule will be unanimously suspended. I think, therefore, we had better go on and pass the resolution before us.

Mr. POMEROY. I apprehend that any individual objecting to the passage of the resolution of thanks would defeat its passage, after the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. So it would now for to-day.

Mr. POMEROY. Unless we proceed to reconsider the resolution. We might proceed to reconsider the resolution, and in that way a majority of the Senate might dispose of it and prepare the way for the passage of the resolution of thanks to General Sheridan. But not wanting to conduct the business in that way, I thought it was easier for us to suspend action upon the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not know how long the debate will continue, and pass the resolution of thanks as it came from the other House. It could not have been reported there from any committee. Under their rule, they have not a committee that can report on this subject. Why send it to a committee in the Senate? The Senator from Iowa says that it will be more valuable and have more character if it comes from the Committee on Military Affairs. It could not have come from any such committee in the House. It has the weight of the House with it here, and if it passes the Senate without a reference, it will have the weight of the Senate and the country. I should like to have the sense of the Senate at least on the motion I make.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think that a resolution of compliment passed by the two Houses is not an act of legislation. It does not require the signature of the President, and has not the effect of law. It is certainly an abuse of terms to speak of it as an act or measure of legislation.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator must be aware that all these resolutions go to the President.

Mr. BUCKALEW. No, sir, I think not.

Mr. POMEROY. They have done so. I have seen it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think it too clear for debate that the question which has been raised by the Senator from Kansas has no foundation in point of fact.

Mr. SUMNER. On the question of what that resolution is I desire to make one remark. It is not a concurrent resolution. If it were so, then of course it would not be a legislative act, nor would the signature of the President be needed; but it is a joint resolution, which must pass both bodies of Congress and then receive the approval of the President. It is, therefore, just as much a legislative act as the act of reconstruction, and it will take its place hereafter in your statute-book precisely as your act of reconstruction takes its place there, except as my friend [Mr. HOWE] reminds me, that it will be classed under the head of "resolutions," instead of statutes. That is the distinction with regard to it. It is a legislative act, and I beg Senators, therefore, when they act upon it not to forget that they are about to adopt a legislative act which does not concern reconstruction.

Mr. HOWARD. The motion before the Senate is to postpone the resolution under discussion, offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, for the present, for the purpose, I suppose, of taking up the complimentary resolution to General Sheridan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question now.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be obliged to vote against that motion of postponement. So far as I understand and have been informed respecting the administration of General Sheridan in his department, I am quite persuaded that he has acted in good faith and with most becoming energy, and with an eye single to the carrying out of the reconstruction legislation of Congress; and in those respects I cannot doubt that he deserves the compliment contained in that resolution. But, sir, we are not to forget that General Sheridan is only one of five generals who are charged with the same identical duties in respect to their military districts to which they have been assigned. I have heard no special complaints against any one of the other officers in charge of their respective districts; and I presume, from all I have heard, that all of them have endeavored at least in good faith to do the same thing. They are perhaps as deserving of the compliments of Congress as is General Sheridan. At all events, I think we had better pause a moment and hear from them and their respective administrations before we thus single out General Sheridan as the proper object for an especial compliment. I do not think that General Sheridan himself would desire a compliment to be paid to him at the expense of his brother officers, charged with precisely the same duties. I hope, therefore, that the motion of postponement will not be adopted, but that we shall proceed to act upon the resolution of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island and endeavor to pass it to-day, for I think if we are to pass such a resolution, the sooner it is done the better, and we shall thus know exactly the extent of our probable legislation at this session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on suspending for the present the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island for the purpose of taking up the other.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I see it is understood by our friends that we can pass the resolution of thanks after the one offered by the Senator from Rhode Island has become the order of the Senate. Understanding that to be the sentiment of the Senate, that we can take it up and consider it after the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, I shall not ask for the yeas and nays upon my motion.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, if I can have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for a moment, I only rise to allude to the statement which that Senator has made to the Senate, that the Secretary of War has informed him that he needs no legislation whatever with regard to Indian affairs.

Mr. WILSON. Military affairs.

Mr. THAYER. Very well; military affairs, in connection with Indian affairs, I suppose. No Senator has stated that he does need any. I do not know that he does, and have not heard that he does. I have the utmost respect for the Secretary of War; but he speaks only for the military department of the Government. I have been informed by the heads of the Bureau of Indian Affairs that some legislation is absolutely necessary at this session of Congress. If it does not take place there will be a condition of things which the country will not approve, even if Congress can approve it. I have not proposed to ask for any legislation in reference to the Army, to increase it; but I did propose at least to favor a bill which looked to a final disposition of all the Indian tribes between the Missouri river and the Rocky mountains, putting them on two reservations which shall be perpetual, and thus to stop an Indian war, if possible, or avert a protracted continuance of it. It is not military legislation which is needed; it is authority to carry out some plan of that sort. Something of that sort is absolutely necessary, rendered so by the condition of things all along the Indian border. If it is proposed to carry on an Indian war as at present it is conducted, the historian of this country will write the history of an Indian farce more disagreeable to refer to than the Indian campaigns of Florida. General Sherman informed me about ten days ago that he had only troops enough to guard and keep open the two lines of communication. He said that he had no power and no means to go beyond that; and that he cannot do effectually. The legislation which I propose to favor is of a different character, and it is that subject which I wish to bring up and in that light, not having reference to an increase of the Army or the forces in the field.

Mr. CAMERON. I feel somewhat embarrassed in giving my vote on this resolution, for the reason that I came here hoping that we should take up all matters connected with the question of reconstruction; and especially did I hope that the bill introduced some time ago by the Senator from Massachusetts, giving the right of suffrage to all citizens in all the States of the Union, would receive the attention of Congress at this session. I still desire that that should be the case; but I have gone into a consultation on this subject, and it is deemed wise by our friends that we shall not touch any of these collateral questions at this time. Having gone into that consultation, I feel bound to act with the majority. I wish it were otherwise; but feeling bound as I do by the result of that consultation, I shall vote against this amendment, regretting that I am compelled to do so, because I should greatly prefer remaining here. The heat does not incommodate me at all. This is a very pleasant place, much more pleasant than any houses or rooms we can find elsewhere. The atmosphere is fine and delicious. I think we could go on now during the heated term and discuss all the great questions of the country better than we shall be able to do it after awhile, during the cold season, when we shall get benumbed in passing through the wide avenues of this city, and then come here and find these Chambers not properly heated, as is often the case. I think we should get along much better now, and that it would be better for the country. But I know discussing this question will do no good. There is a majority here determined not to bring up any measure except the main question of compelling the President to do his duty in this great crisis of the country. We might debate this matter for a week and we should not change a vote; and therefore why shall we occupy the time uselessly? For the reason I have stated I shall vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 6, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, and Wade—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROSS. I offer an amendment to the resolution, to add after the word "subjects" in the last line the words "except such as may be rendered necessary for the preservation of the peace on the western frontiers," so that the resolution will read:

Resolved, That the legislative business of this session be confined to removing the obstructions which have been, or are likely to be, placed in the way of the fair execution of the acts of reconstruction heretofore adopted by Congress, and to giving to said acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed; and that further legislation at this session on the subject of reconstruction or other subjects, except such as may be rendered necessary for the preservation of the peace on the western frontiers, is not expedient.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the amendment will not prevail. If any legislation should become necessary for the preservation of peace on the frontiers, the order adopted is in the control of the Senate at any time. If we make this exception, we must make a great many others. The Secretary of War says he requires no legislation. The legislation which my friend from Kansas requires, if I understood his remarks, was a bill to collect all the Indians in one vast reservation, a bill that could not be passed through both Houses of Congress short of three months legislation. I do not know of any other except the one alluded to by the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. TIPTON,] who proposes that we shall remain here to perfect a bill for offering rewards for the scalps of Indians.

Mr. TIPTON. That can be put as an amendment to his bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. As an amendment to the bill of the Senator from Kansas. I hope we shall not remain here for either of those purposes.

Mr. ROSS. The reason why I offer this amendment is, that I do not wish to leave this subject to any contingency by which it may be defeated by some Senator objecting to the introduction of such a measure. Very likely such an objection would be made, and it would rise from the unbelief which pervades a large portion of the eastern States that there is any necessity for such legislation. In proof of the opinion that something is necessary, that war exists on the frontier, that our settlers are being driven in, that public improvements are stopped, I send to the desk a proclamation just issued by the Governor of my State, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF KANSAS, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
TOPEKA, July 1, 1867.

Central and western Kansas has been, and is still, overrun and invaded by bands of hostile Indians, who are indiscriminately murdering, scalping, and mutilating our frontiersettlers, travelers on the great western thoroughfares, and the employes on the Union Pacific railway, eastern division. They have almost entirely cut off communication between Kansas and the States and Territories west. The United States forces now on the Plains are unable to protect life and property. And, having received authority from Lieutenant General Sherman to raise a volunteer cavalry force of eight companies, to be mustered into the United States service for four months, unless sooner discharged, I therefore appeal to all good citizens of the State to favor, facilitate, and aid this effort to protect the frontier settler, the traveler, and the workmen engaged in the construction of the great national thoroughfare, the Union Pacific railway, eastern division.

S. J. CRAWFORD, Governor.

Mr. ANTHONY. That shows that the Governor of Kansas is taking care of the State very well, and the Secretary of War says he will require no legislation. If any legislation should be necessary, if it has friends enough to be passed through the body, it will have friends enough to rescind this order.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator must be aware that there is no appropriation for the pay of volunteers.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it should be the sentiment of the body that such an appropriation ought to be made, the number necessary to pass the appropriation will be sufficient to rescind this order; and if it should be found necessary there will be no difficulty in doing it. Certainly I shall be in favor of it if it shall be found necessary; but if you make one exception, you will have to make another, and thus you will fritter away the resolution so that nothing will be left. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. ROSS. The difficulty is that one objection, as I understand the rule, will preclude the offering of any such proposition.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the order can be rescinded on one day's notice. A motion can be made to rescind this order, and it can be considered the following day, and then a majority can repeal it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays. ["No, no; we will vote it down."] I withdraw the call.

Mr. TIPTON. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will simply say before the vote is taken that if this amendment prevails we shall be obliged to admit a great many others, which have just as good a claim upon us. We might as well not pass the order at all unless we pass it absolutely, reserving to ourselves, as we cannot deprive ourselves of, the power of rescinding it on one day's notice. The only effect of this order is, that it prevents the consideration of any other subject without one day's notice.

Mr. HARLAN. From the representations made by Senators from several of the States there is an immediate necessity for legislation on the subject they name. I am disposed to conform my action to the judgment of my political friends in the Senate; but I think they ought not to insist on a rule so rigid as to cut off legislation on a subject of this kind. They say there is an immediate necessity for legislation on the subject to preserve the lives of families exposed on the western frontier. In the face of that statement made by several Senators on their authority as such on this floor, I am not willing to adopt a rule to cut off the necessary legislation.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall vote in favor of this amendment of the Senator from Kansas. From the accounts which we get in the newspapers and from various other sources, it can no longer be concealed that there is a very menacing and dangerous state of things existing along the frontier between the settlers and the Indian tribes; and I think the necessity of making some provision for the protection of the pioneers is at this time very pressing upon us. It is a subject which I do not feel at liberty to dismiss from my mind as a member of this body. Only a few days ago a son of my own, on his return from western Kansas with a little party whom he accompanied, came across the dead body of a settler, who had been in that region for some short space of time, but who had been deliberately murdered by a band of Indians in pursuit of plunder. Having murdered the man and scalped him, they robbed him of his stock and some other articles of personal property and made their escape. My son assisted in bearing away the dead body and burying it. From various other sources I gather that this state of things is very prevalent throughout the West all along the frontier; and I do think it is the duty of Congress to do something to protect the settlers who settle upon the Plains and expose themselves to such dangers. I do not think we shall occupy much time about it. It may be necessary to enact some law for raising troops for the protection of the frontier; it may be necessary to make an appropriation of money for this same purpose; and I do not wish to tie my hands upon a subject which is so pressing upon us, and as to which certainly the country, and particularly the frontier settlers, are now looking to us with most anxious eyes. I am willing to sit here a considerable time to relieve them if it be in our power to do so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very slow to believe that any legislation in the line indicated by the Senators from the frontier is at all necessary. In the first place, we have no information from the War Department that they desire it. General Sherman is in command of the frontier, and has been for many months. It is fair to presume that he knows quite as much in regard to the needs of the frontier and what is necessary for its defense as can possibly be known by what are termed the pioneers and the border settlers. I stand exactly on that fact, then; as we have no information on the subject from the constituted authorities; as those who undoubtedly have the best information on this subject, who have every means and whose duty it is to know, make no communication and ask us for no aid, and when they are advised with on the subject say that on their view of the subject none is needed, I think the presumptions are all against it.

But, Mr. President, I go a little further. I do not intend to do more than touch this subject, because it is a pretty large subject, and behind what is proposed here is more perhaps than would be imagined, as you will find if you enter upon it; and I do not intend to characterize anything that has been said or what is demanded in the way of securities or anything of that sort. I am not satisfied, from the opportunity I have had for examination into Indian affairs, that the wrong is all on one side, or that the injuries are all on one side, or the aggressions are all on one side; and when I say so, I do not think I compliment the savages much, either. There is a state of feeling and sentiment on the frontiers which renders it impossible that even decency can be shown toward the savages. This is not a new subject to the Senate. We have had for a little over two years, I believe, an investigation by one of the most important committees of the Senate into this very subject of Indian difficulties. They have been on the spot; they have taken testimony; they have gone at large and examined personally; and they reported to the Senate last year: and what was the result of it? Why, sir, in every instance they have told the Senate and the country that we are the savages; that the aggressions have been in every instance on our side; that the Indian wars on the frontier were the result of our own indiscretions and absolute aggressions on the rights of the Indians. That is the record here in a very elaborate report, covering some four or five hundred pages, with the full testimony as taken of officers on the frontier, Indian agents, and those who had the best means of knowing everything in regard to it. The result of the whole matter is, from a committee of your own selection, that the Government and people of this country are all wrong on this subject; that the Indian war of 1864, which cost the Government $9,000,000, was the result of our own folly, our own misdeeds; and a good deal more might be said in the same line. That which followed it in 1865 was characterized undoubtedly by Indian atrocities; but who began it? The committee say we began it; it was altogether our fault, altogether the indiscretions and aggressions of our own people; and that cost us $29,000,000, it is said.

I no more believe in the necessity of this Indian war than I believe in the necessity at this moment of a war with Mexico; not a bit of it. I do not mean to ignore the fact which all these gentlemen from the frontiers testify to, that there is collision. That is so undoubtedly. Are we ignorant of the fact that we are spreading our population now right in contact with these Indians? And are we ignorant of the fact that there is an utter disregard of the rights of these Indians under the treaty stipulations you have made with them? Is there any Indian reservation in Kansas or Nebraska or anywhere else that is not absolutely invaded to-day, and the rights of the Indians set aside as if there were no treaty stipulations? Everybody that knows anything about Indian affairs knows that is true everywhere. You make treaties with the Indians; you put them in advance of your population; and the moment your settlers advance and come in contact with them, they take possession bodily, and then comes collision, and then the savage shows his character, and then treaties are made to push him further away.

Now, sir, in all this country which is covered by the order of General Sherman, there are treaty stipulations which secure that land to the Indians—if there is any such thing as securing it; and if we go upon the theory that they are independent nations and make treaties with them, those treaties are to be observed. They are entitled to that country by treaty stipulations, and the order of General Sherman supersedes those treaty stipulations in every instance. If they were independent nations in the sense in which our theory assigns it, of course it would cause a war. They have a right to go to war and show cause to the civilized nations of the earth.

I will not vote a dollar to prosecute a war against these Indians on my present information and belief upon this subject. I do not believe it necessary. Whatever is necessary for defense against the madness and extreme savageness of these tribes in their infuriated condition, growing out, as the evidence is before us, of our own aggressions, of course I am willing to vote. If General Sherman and the War Department say that they have not sufficient force for the protection of the frontiers, let them say it, and I shall be very glad to vote the means, both men and money, to enable them to defend the frontiers and the people of the frontiers against the savage bands. But, sir, I am not willing, while the record stands as I say it does, to authorize a war of extermination, a war for the scalps of these people. I do not believe in it. Let us perform our treaty stipulations; let us do our whole duty to these Indians; and then it will be time enough for us to talk about extermination.

I have said all that I rose to say, which was simply to express a doubt whether any legislation on this subject is necessary at the present moment.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to protract this discussion on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas; but I must beg the indulgence of the Senate for one moment, while I make a brief reply to some of the observations made by the Senator from Maine.

It is undoubtedly true that in their intercourse with the whites, the Indians are from time to time imposed upon and defrauded. The whole history of the Indian tribes from the discovery of the American continent to the present moment evinces that truth; but it is equally true that the Indian himself in his natural characteristics is wanting in good faith. The history of the tribes and of their affairs in this country has, I will not say uniformly shown, but has generally shown that as tribes and nations, they are regardless of the faith of treaties; and it cannot be truthfully said that the causes of these collisions always arise from among the white men. There are wrongs committed upon the white man and upon the white settler especially, by the Indians, which are totally unprovoked; and this has been true for the same length of time.

Now, sir, how is it at the present time upon the frontier? We have all seen a recent order of General Sherman, whose truth certainly cannot and will not be questioned, announcing to the people of his department that they must arm themselves and defend themselves by means of their own volunteer soldiery, for he is unable with the means placed in his hands by the Government to protect the frontier from Indian incursions. Here is a state not of actual, formal hostility between the whites and the red man, but a state very nearly bordering upon it, a state of things which is evinced from day to day by incursions made by Indians for the purpose of plunder, the stealing and carrying away of horses and other articles of personal property, secret assassinations by means of the tomahawk and by means of the arrow, the destruction of fathers and mothers in their cabins upon the frontier, and, horrible to relate, the deliberate butchery of helpless infancy in the cradle. All these atrocities of which the white settlers complain cannot be entirely causeless and groundless; undoubtedly there may be acts of imposition and injustice practiced by our own people upon the Indians; but shall we say, because a few white men upon the frontier do acts which in themselves are unjust, thus calling down upon them the vengeance of the tomahawk and the indiscriminate slaughter of families, that we will do nothing; that we will not recognize our obligation to protect our own countrymen, because a white man in one particular instance happens to be in the wrong? I think not.

I have no longer that peculiar sympathy, that romantic sympathy which haunts the minds of the young and the novel readers in this and in other countries, and which teaches to some minds that the Indian is a very heroic and admirable character. I believe nothing in all that romance and in all that farce. It is true, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TITTON] has said, that the proper, and I may say the only means of inspiring the Indians with reverence for the authority of the United States is to show him our actual power. He will respect that when he knows that his own destruction is to be the penalty to be inflicted upon him for infringing upon our laws and murdering our people. But at the same time, sir, I do not preach up an indiscriminate slaughter and annihilation of the Indian tribes. We must, however, use toward them that amount of physical force which is necessary to restrain their vicious inclinations and to compel them, so far as is possible, to observe the rules which prevail among civilized nations that go to war. After all, the great contest between the Indian tribes in this country and the white population is the contest naturally and inevitably growing out of savagery. It is the fight between barbarism in its worst form and civilization; and mourn over its consequences as much as we may, and deplore them as much as we may, we cannot avert them; and it is our duty to stand up and defend the spirit of our own institutions and to defend our own people against the atrocious aggressions of private murder and savage rapine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the question before the Senate was anything like that suggested by the Senator from Michigan, I might vote with him; but it is very unwise to change the issue. The issue is not whether we are disposed or not on all proper occasions and whenever it may be necessary to protect our own people on the borders and elsewhere. I am as much in favor of that as anybody. If Indian wars arise, whether rightfully or wrongfully so far as we are concerned, and we are in absolute collision, we must do all that is necessary in order to put an end to the war and protect the people on the border. I agree to that fully. But, sir, that is not the question here; and there is no call for the kind of eloquence which we hear more or less of at every session about Indian barbarity and the frauds and abuses of our white people with reference to them. That is a moot point about which there are differences of opinion. I have mine; but here, on this occasion, it is unnecessary to express what I think. The question simply is, whether we shall make an exception in this case of the necessary or any legislation upon this subject, in the resolution which we propose to pass; whether it is wise to make an exception there. It is a question of expediency with regard to the business of the Senate. That is all there is of it—not a question of Indian warfare generally, or the protection of our people; or offering a reward for the scalps of Indians as proposed by the Senator from Nebraska on my right.

Now, sir, what is the design of this resolution? Nothing more nor less than to designate the business which, as at present advised, we think it necessary to do at this present session; that is all; and gentlemen have stated the grounds upon which we present that question; that whatever may have been the opinion and the prophecy of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, when we adopted the resolution with reference to an adjournment, the general sentiment was that there would be no occasion whatever for a session, and that there would not be a quorum present. Events have occurred to render that necessary in the judgment of gentlemen who have come here; and the question is, whether, as at present advised, we will confine our attention to the matter which called us here specifically; that is all.

Now, what is the object of it? The object is to notify all gentlemen that we do not mean to go into general legislation, and that all petitions and all resolutions and everything of that sort will, as a general rule, be disposed of by laying them upon the table for future action, if gentlemen see fit to offer them. The design is to prevent an embarrassment which will arise from the disposition of every Senator to present his own peculiar matters of interest, and not to exclude what hereafter in the course of the session we may possibly think it necessary to do. If it appears in the course of this session, before we adjourn, by competent testimony, that it is best to legislate on this subject at any period, I am perfectly willing to do it; but if we make an exception in this case, now, how can we refuse to make exceptions in other cases? If this amendment is adopted, some other gentleman will offer another exception, and that will lead to a long debate, and we shall get into it as we do in the case of amendments or bills offered by an opposition, and there will be no end to it, and we shall accomplish nothing, and the resolution, if we pass it, will be good for nothing.

It has been stated, and correctly stated, that if evidence is offered to the Senate that there is a necessity for immediate action at this session on the subject of the Indian hostilities upon the borders, all Senators being convinced of that will be ready to take it up and act upon it. This matter is fully in our control; and why should gentlemen be so urgent to control the views of the Senate on this subject directly in the face of the testimony which has been offered here by competent authority? Does anybody pretend to doubt that Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, believes what he says, that there will be no occasion for legislation? There is competent authority on the subject from a man perfectly acquainted with the subject. Certain Senators who live on the borders say they differ with him, that they think there is occasion for legislation; but it is a mere difference of opinion. Let them talk the matter over and convince their friends on this floor that it is so, and nobody will be more ready to vote to rescind this rule in such a case than I will.

Allusion has been made, or I would not allude to it, by the Senator from Pennsylvania and another to a consultation on this subject; and a consultation was proper on the subject. It was perfectly proper that we should understand each other and each other's views; and this matter was all considered, and all debated, and all decided. When I reflect that I was called to order, not exactly that, but lectured on this floor by an eminent Senator for expressing a private opinion to a member of the House that the decision the Senate had come to on a certain measure was not a correct one, although I supported and voted for it and stuck to it in my votes, it is a little singular to me that gentlemen who went into that consultation, argued their views in full and voted, should now come in here and say they are not bound by anything that took place in consultation with their friends. I shall remember it for future occasions as applicable to my own case.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator does not refer to me as having lectured him before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir, I do not. I do not accuse the Senator of that. He never undertook it that I know of.

Now, sir, with reference to this matter, all I ask is that the thing shall be done as we have been in the habit of doing it; that gentlemen should be bound by the rule which they apply to others. Let them labor to convince their friends, and nobody is more ready to be convinced than I am, that with reference to this particular thing it should be taken out of the operation of this rule after we have once adopted it, and not oppose its adoption in the first place just as it was agreed upon and understood. I speak of it with freedom; I should not have spoken of it had it not been mentioned by others. But I deemed it eminently proper—it is always proper for the majority, in my judgment, who have to be responsible for the business of the Senate, to have a consultation among themselves upon the mode which shall be adopted of carrying it on, and what shall be taken up, especially at a time like this. It is a matter of public propriety which I am ready to defend everywhere. I only go a little further and say that when it has been done, gentlemen who find themselves in the minority should not bring their warfare into this Senate Chamber.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Maine has stated very clearly, as he always does when he makes the effort, the exact question now pending. It is, as I understand it, whether this resolution shall be so modified as to make an exception in the case presented by the Senators from two or three of the States of the frontier, which they deem of great importance, requiring the immediate attention of Congress. They say that the frontier is greatly exposed; that a general Indian war has been commenced, which is likely to become general; that citizens are being massacred, and that it is possible to avert the danger, to end this bloodshed and thus curtail the expenditure of public treasure; and therefore move to amend the pending resolution so as to leave the way open for the proper legislation to effect this result. The Senator from Maine thinks that when gentlemen of a particular political faith consult together and come to a conclusion in relation to public measures, they ought to be bound by the decision of the majority. I agree with him fully. But there is a fact of some importance in connection with the consultation which has not been mentioned by the Senator from Maine; and that is, that the phraseology of no resolution was agreed on in that conference. The general subject was discussed, and perhaps some formal proposition made on the subject; but a gentleman was requested to draw up a resolution covering the subject-matter, and present it in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will remember that a resolution was formally agreed upon, and that the understanding was that the phraseology should be so amended as to make it proper for a resolution of the Senate. The particular subject-matter was agreed to, and it is in that form now.

Mr. HARLAN. And that resolution has been presented and amended in the Senate with the concurrence of the Senator from Maine and the gentleman who offered it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Only by restoring words that were stricken out by mistake.

Mr. ANTHONY. As I moved the amendment, I desire to say that the amendment was to correct a clerical error. The resolution was agreed upon in consultation with our friends, and the word "legislative" was left out by mistake in copying the resolution. It was in the original.

Mr. HARLAN. As I understand, there was no original resolution that was agreed to in terms. The general subject was agreed on; and I feel bound by the conclusion of that consultation, except so far as facts coming to my knowledge since, not known at the time, justify a departure. But, Mr. President, since that consultation, important facts have been elicited that were not known to that caucus, at least as fully as they are now known, demanding serious consideration. It is now stated that citizens of the United States on the frontier are being slaughtered by the savages, which Senators tell us could be prevented by judicious legislation. They believe that some remedial legislation would prevent this destruction of human life, and probably the useless expenditure of treasure. The Senators representing States immediately on the border all concur in this statement of facts. It is also patent to us that the Representatives and Senators from the States beyond Kansas and Nebraska are not present, except one Senator who happened to be delayed on this side of the mountains after the adjournment in April last. It is known to every Senator here that no one of those Senators can visit the capital of the nation unless he visits it by sea.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there any Indian war on that side of the mountains?

Mr. HARLAN. So far as they are able to present the condition of the country on that side of the mountains we are without information. It is also patent to every Senator here that the Territories lying between the States on the Missouri river and the States on the Pacific are unrepresented. I believe that no one of those Delegates is here to represent the condition of the country. We know from newspaper statements—how reliable I am not able to say—that an Indian war does prevail in each one of those Territories of greater or less magnitude; that the thoroughfares of communication between the more settled parts of the country and New Mexico and Arizona and Colorado, and Utah and Idaho and Montana are obstructed. It is known from the same means of information that the laborers on those thoroughfares, the construction of which is being prosecuted at great public and private cost, have been driven in, and this important work greatly retarded, in consequence of the hostility of the savages.

Now, in the face of these facts, I think it would be wise and prudent to make an exception of that one subject in this general resolution. I am willing to be bound by the judgment of my friends. I agree with them on the general subject, that unless there is a special exigency requiring a departure the attention of Congress at the present session ought to be confined exclusively to the perfection of the laws for the restoration of the States in the Union which have recently been in rebellion. But here is a case which we now know is exceptional, where vast treasure is being expended, as Senators say, uselessly, and numberless lives are being destroyed which they think might be saved by the proper legislation on the part of the two branches of Congress now in session. In the face of these statements made by the Senators whose people are immediately interested, who stand between our constituencies and the frontier, I am not willing to say, at the opening of this session, that I will not, as at present advised, consider the legislation they may present on that subject.

It has been stated here that the Secretary of War needs no additional legislation on the subject. It may prove to be true that in the judgment of the Senate and the House no additional legislation may be necessary. I hope it may be so. If so, when this shall become manifest the Senate can properly dismiss the subject. But for us to say at the opening of the session, in the face of these declarations of Senators, our peers on this floor, and the facts established by current history, and in the absence of the Delegates from the Territories whose people are immediately exposed, and the Senators from the other side of the mountains, including a vast region of country in equal danger of Indian depredations, that we will not at this session consider that subject, I think would be improper; and I do not think the Senators here who have concurred in the general judgment which has induced the pending resolution ought to insist on it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to know what is the practical value of this pending amendment, in view of the fact that the same mere majority of the Senate by which any measure whatever could be passed may at any time within twenty-four hours rescind this resolution so as to let in the subject which the Senator is discussing?

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator's question answers itself. If there is no practical importance in the amendment, then there is no practical importance in the resolution itself. If it is so purely ephemeral that it may be removed by a bare vote—

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, I submit to him that there is great practical importance, not only in the resolution, but in preserving its integrity as it is, because if we commence now by making an exception with regard to a subject, which, for one, I do not believe is susceptible of legislative remedy at all, how can we refuse to make exceptions with regard to other subjects which everybody knows can, in a general sense, be shown to be more or less exceptional in their character? It seems to me, if an exception is made with regard to this subject now, then we must permit every Senator who can suggest a subject, local or otherwise, with regard to which a real emergency exists, to except that also; whereas, if we adhere to the resolution, and if, despite the statement of the Secretary of War to the contrary, evidence is produced here showing that we ought to act upon this, then at any time within twenty-four hours a naked majority of the Senate may rescind it, and take up this subject, which will then appear to be necessary.

Mr. HARLAN. Why, Mr. President, the difference is very manifest, and I have been sustaining the proposition of the Senator from Kansas on the ground of the difference between this and all other subjects that have been named.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And somebody else will present something different, and so it will go on.

Mr. HARLAN. If some other Senator should present some other subject equally urgent, in my judgment, it ought to be made an exception; and if the Senator believed as the Senators from these States who have spoken believe, he would concur with me in the judgment that it ought to be an exception. If the Senator's own State was exposed to the assaults of a public enemy and his people were being slaughtered day by day before his eyes, I am sure he would present a potential barrier should any Senator propose to close the door to legislative relief. Sir, if the facts stated by Senators here to-day are true, and if legislative remedies are practicable, the relief should be granted promptly and unhesitatingly. We should not be required to change the rules of the Senate before a bill could be introduced or a memorial referred. As there is no existing barrier, none should be erected. The rule should be so modified before its adoption as to relieve this subject from embarrassment.

Of course, if Senators do not believe these facts, if they do not think they exist, if they think the statements in regard to them are imaginary, then they will be justified in including this subject in the general exclusion; but believing as I do, I cannot do so. And as these facts have come to my knowledge in part since the consultation referred to, were not discussed at the time, and could not have been fully considered in making up the general judgment, I think I am justifiable in voting to modify the resolution in this respect; and I shall do so without feeling that I have broken faith with any one. I think enough facts have been presented, enough knowledge has been elicited to make it my duty to differ with those who may vote for the resolution in the precise form in which it has been introduced. I think this ought to be made an exception. Of course, if a majority differ with me they will so record their votes, and take the responsibility.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise merely to ask a question, and I do so in consequence of the fact that I have given some little attention to this subject since I came here, and have endeavored to ascertain, if I possibly could, what character of legislation could be adopted in order to stop the atrocities on the border and to stop the expenditure of money that is being now made and must necessarily be made in the future on account of them, and up to this moment I am really unable to make a single suggestion to the Senate on that subject. War exists with these Indian tribes. It is unnecessary for me now to give my opinions as to the causes bringing about the war. It exists: that is sufficient. As the Senator from Maine justly says, it is our duty to defend our citizens, the war existing. That is all we can do. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he proposes to increase the Army for the purpose of defending our settlers upon the frontiers. Is it designed to increase the Army; or is it designed to agree on the part of the United States Government to pay for troops that may be called out in these respective States; or what is the character of legislation that he or others propose to adopt? And I ask it simply to control my vote on this subject. It is a question of very great importance; and the Senator from Maine will remember that in caucus I suggested that in all probability it might be well to except this matter of the pending Indian war. I even up to that moment had endeavored to ascertain something about it so as to decide what I ought to suggest as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I have since continued the same endeavor. I have not had a personal interview with the Secretary of War; but I learn that the Secretary is of opinion that nothing can be done by Congress to facilitate operations on his part, that nothing can be done by us to aid the military in the defense of the frontier. Whether that be so or not, it will be for the Senate to inquire. I am not exactly prepared to take the statement of the Secretary of War on a subject of that character.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. He says that war exists. I ask him who declared it, or when it was declared?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is impossible for me to say. I only know that war does exist between the United States Government and the Indian tribes now. I apprehend that it exists from the fact that travelers, persons going to the mines, are daily being butchered upon the Plains, and stock is being run off by the Indians, and our people are killing the Indians. I was on the Plains a short time ago, and I found troops moving toward the West, for the purpose of hunting up and attacking the Indian tribes. I take it for granted, from these facts, that a state of war exists. Who commenced it I am not exactly able to say; and if I were able to tell the Senator from Wisconsin, I do not think I should commence a work of that sort just now.

Now, Mr. President, permit me to say that I shall vote for this resolution and against the amendment, inasmuch as our friends have decided to adopt the resolution in the shape in which it is; and inasmuch as it is now clear that if any legislation becomes necessary our friends here can rescind this resolution upon a notice of twenty-four hours; and in fact, if anything becomes important in the premises, I do not suppose any Senator would object to any action which might be suggested which would have the effect of stopping the war, because I apprehend it is going to cost us some two or three hundred million dollars. Senators might as well understand the question now. It is a difficulty that may not be ended for years. It is a matter of much more serious importance than some Senators seem to believe. It is a war against a few individuals; but it ought to be remembered that they have an immense district of country to roam over. They do not fight us except at a disadvantage. They can go on their Indian ponies where we cannot follow them with regular cavalry. We cannot undertake to prosecute a war against them in the summer season with infantry: our men die of disease, and they attack them at a great disadvantage. Hence thousands and thousands of our soldiers will be killed, and perhaps very few of the savages. It is a question of very great importance, and it ought to be considered with a great deal of care. It ought to be considered because of the fact that our public debt is now large enough, and if anything can be done to prevent its augmentation, of course no Senator ought to object. But I have perfected nothing in my own mind, and I suppose no member of the committee has perfected any legislation. This war I had hoped would be avoided; but things have got worse and worse from day to day since the adjournment of Congress, a few months ago, and now it is a war of vast proportions, calculated in my judgment to cost this nation as much as the war of 1812 with Great Britain; and perhaps we shall, as I have said, kill very few of these Indian savages; and if we kill them all, I doubt whether the Government of the United States will reap much credit from the act. It is a war in which we have all to lose and nothing to gain. If anything is done, it seems to me we ought to appoint a commission to proceed among the Indians if they can possibly get there; and they ought to be required to go there even at the risk of great danger to their scalps, because other individuals are losing them daily; and they ought to endeavor when they reach the Indian tribes to adjust matters and make peace with them—make peace with them because we can gain no laurels in war, and because for every man of them we kill we shall lose a dozen, yea, twenty, and in my judgment a hundred.

Mr. President, I am not prepared to say, however, that anything can be done in that line; but if it can be done, and if I shall rise in my place here, or any other Senator from the frontier shall rise and say to the Senate that he has matured something, I do not for a moment suppose, in view of the vast expenditure of money which is now presented, and in view of the fact that as we are now going on our emigrant trains are daily attacked and the construction of the two branches of the Pacific railway must be impeded if not entirely stopped, that any Senator in his place would dare to object to the consideration of such a measure. No Senator could do it in the face of all these facts.

So feeling, I shall vote against the amendment; in the first place, because our friends have agreed to adopt that course of policy; and in the second place, if we vary it in this instance, we shall have to change it at the suggestion of other gentlemen who have matters of vast importance, in their judgment, for Congress to attend to. I could, perhaps, suggest some things of another nature, that I would like very much to have excepted from the operation of the resolution; but if I do that, other Senators will desire to do so also, and unless we confine the resolution to what was originally adopted, we shall, in my judgment, lose much time. Therefore, Mr. President, and inasmuch as we can rescind it at any time, and inasmuch as the subject involved in this amendment is one in which we all feel deeply interested, and proper legislation upon which no Senator will dare to oppose, I shall vote against the amendment; and I hope the Senate will vote it down and adopt the resolution as presented.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment, but I intended to give a silent vote for it, and in case it was defeated, as I supposed it would be, I intended to give a silent vote against the resolution introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island; and I should not have said a word in explanation of my vote but for the fact that it has been said here that a judgment has already gone, a judgment which is binding upon the individual members of the Senate, and that we are precluded by some decision reached elsewhere from offering any opposition to, or giving votes against, the resolution proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not understand that any such judgment has been entered up against me. At the only consultation that I ever heard of on this subject, it will be remembered by those who were present at the time that consultation took place that I stated that I could not be made by any human power to vote for such a proposition as this offered by the Senator from Rhode Island before the Senate; not because the constituency that I represent have any grievance to lay before this body that I know of; as far as I know they are satisfied in the main with the laws already upon the statute-book, except so far as they refer to the subject which is excepted in the resolution; not because I know that any legislation is important to the country in reference to the question contemplated in the amendment now pending, but simply because the adoption of the resolution, if I do not greatly misunderstand it, just destroys pro tanto the legislative character of this body. When you have adopted that, you are not a Senator except in reference to one matter. If I understand the resolution, when you have adopted it I cannot without a breach of the laws of this House offer a petition from any portion of the people of the United States; then I cannot without violating the rules of the House introduce a bill here, no matter how necessary I may conceive it, no matter how large the interests involved in it. Now, if it places us in that predicament, and it seems to me to do so, and no less than that, certainly I can no more be made by the decree of a caucus to vote for that proposition than I could be made to vote for one, simply because the caucus had agreed to it, to strike from any one of my fellows here his right or his left arm. It changes the character of the body, and I cannot assent to it.

That is my view of it. I stated it in the only consultation I ever attended on this subject. I did not suppose any gentleman would insist that I was bound by the decision of that body or by the conclusion arrived at in that consultation. Having that information before them, they might have excluded me from the consultation if they saw fit. I do not know what penalties I subject myself to by disagreeing here and now with the conclusions then arrived at. Whatever those penalties are I shall submit to them, I trust, with becoming grace and fortitude. I must take them. I cannot submit to do this thing.

Now, upon the pending question, this amendment, I do not undertake to say that legislation is required in reference to the state of things on the frontier; but I do state this, Mr. President, that you have two lines of railway stretching toward the West from the Missouri river through a country over which no member of this Senate dares to drive a buggy; over which no member of this Senate dares to transport the mails of the United States. It cannot be done with safety: it can only be done by large bodies of men. Now, it is useless for us to stop here in the very morning of this session and inquire who is most to blame. There is the fact; over a portion of your territory your citizens and your mails cannot go. You are providing two great highways, the avenues for what we believe will be very soon an immense commerce. The commerce that now goes over those highways as far as they extend is not particularly obstructed, because it is moved with large forces and with great celerity. I passed over one of those highways the other day; I stood upon one of the cars and was pointed to a ranche which two days before I stood there was stampeded by a party of Indians and the stock driven off. I rode along over that very highway, and from the window of the car was pointed to the very spot where the day before we went along a citizen was shot down by Indians.

Well, now, in view of this state of fact, it would seem as though it was necessary that something should be done. Perhaps the wisdom of Congress need not be involved. Perhaps there are laws on the statute-books already sufficient to enable the executive department of the Government to deal with this question. But the Senator from Missouri has said that war actually exists, and I was curious to know how war happened to exist. I understand how it may happen that the military forces of the United States may be moved to the defense of these citizens of ours on our own territory and standing upon our own highways. That is not war. We can repel an invasion from whatever quarter it comes, or by whomsoever it is made, without committing an act of war. But what has been done or what authority is there which authorizes us to move armed forces into the country of any Indian tribe or of any other nation? That is what I want to know. I do not know that they have gone there. If they have not gone there, and do not propose to go there, then I take it war does not exist. It is said they have gone. I do not know the authority for such a movement; and if they have actually gone there, they undoubtedly saw the necessity of going there, and if there is necessity for going there, it seems to me it is high time we had some legislation authorizing them to go there.

But, Mr. President, I shall not dwell upon this branch of the subject at all, because it is no part of my real reason for voting against the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island and that I see any particular legislation other than that included in his resolution to be absolutely necessary. As I said in the outset, and as I repeat in the conclusion, I must be allowed to vote against that resolution, simply because I think it deprives the Senate of the United States of one of its essential attributes, of its essential character.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, I rise simply to correct two misapprehensions of the Senator from Maine who sits nearest to me, [Mr. MORRILL,] into which he has been led. He asks where is there an Indian reservation which is not invaded to-day by the white people? Well, I respond to him by stating that there are five Indian reservations within the State of Nebraska, between which and the whites there has been the most perfect accord and friendship for the seven years past; not the slightest interference or collision between the Indians upon those reservations and the white settlers. That is my answer to his interrogatory. These troubles do not arise with the friendly Indians, but with the hostile Indians, which are away beyond Nebraska and Kansas, upon the Plains, whose lands have not been invaded by the whites. Those who have committed these outrages and these murders are not the Indians whose lands have been interfered with by the whites. They are those who have come from their own section of the country down to the two Pacific railroads, and there is where they are creating the difficulty. It is simply a question between civilization and barbarism. They are opposed to those two Pacific railroads, and that is, after all, the real cause of the trouble. So much on that point.

The Senator from Maine alluded to a report of a committee which went to the Indian country some two years ago, and has made his remarks here based upon the information which they reported. Now, sir, I desire to characterize that report as it deserves. My honorable friend knows that I have too high a regard for him to use any language which he can construe as disrespectful to him. I cannot do that, but utterly disclaim it. He has presented his views, giving as his authority the information and the report of others. It is that information, that report from others, which I, here in this Senate—and I do it that it may go forth to this nation—characterize as a most reckless misrepresentation of the truth, a most atrocious slander upon the American people and the American Government; for the language was that the American Government and the American people were the sole aggressors in all these difficulties, that they had brought about all these Indian troubles and Indian wars, and were responsible for all these outrages, murders, and massacres.

I have risen to deny that statement and to characterize it, I repeat, as a most reckless misrepresentation of the truth, referring to those who made it, and not to the honorable Senator, who has been deceived by that report. It matters not who they were, what committee, whether Senators or Representatives, or citizens; the report is not borne out by the truth.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is the honorable Senator aware that that report which he so characterizes was made by a committee of the Senate?

Mr. THAYER. The Senator referred to a report made by a committee. He did not state who composed the committee. But I suppose he referred to one which went over the Plains some two years ago.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The honorable Senator I suppose must be aware of the report which he characterizes. The report to which I referred and the report which he characterizes as atrociously false, is a report of a committee of this body, or rather I believe a joint committee of the two Houses, and some of its members are now within the sound of my voice.

Mr. THAYER. What I mean to say is, that such a report is unfounded. I do not question either the motives or intentions or integrity of those who made it, or impute to them anything wrong. To be more explicit, I will say, they were most egregiously deceived by the parties whose testimony they took in the matter—by Indian chiefs. I have seen men deceived by Indian chiefs before. They will make those who are not familiar with Indian character believe almost anything they choose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to inquire whether he has read that report? If so, he must know that after very long investigation, and upon very elaborate examination of numerous witnesses in different parts of that country—not Indians, not Indian chiefs, but Government officers in almost every case, superintendents of Indian affairs, officers of the Army commanding at the various posts—the committee reported the conclusion to which I have referred. The committee, as I understand, resorted to the men who were governing and directing Indian affairs in that region of the country, and intelligent men everywhere. Their sources of information appear to have been sought from persons of the highest respectability, and those who, on that subject above all others, might be supposed to be disinterested. Therefore, I can hardly conceive that it is possible that such a committee as I know this to have been, examining the subject as I know they did, could easily have been imposed upon to the extent my honorable friend really suppose they were.

Mr. THAYER. I carefully noted the language of my honorable friend from Maine. It was to this effect, and in almost these words: that the report justified the charge that the Government and people were wholly responsible for, and were the aggressors in all these troubles and outrages. That was his language, I believe. If I misunderstood him he will correct me. If that committee gave currency to such a report, I denounce it as a most outrageous misrepresentation; and yet I impute nothing wrong to those who gave currency to it. They were undoubtedly deceived. I do not impugn their motives or intentions.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I have a single remark to make in regard to my vote upon this amendment. I supposed, of course, there was some understanding in this matter, and I am perfectly willing to be held to whatever understanding really existed at the time the resolution was agreed upon elsewhere; but I was not aware, when the resolution was first brought forward there, that it was to be offered here. However, if it is considered as binding, I am willing to be bound by it.

Mr. SUMNER. It cannot be binding.

Mr. FOWLER. But I was opposed to it for this reason: if we can act prudently in caucus, we can act with equal prudence here. I do not see any reason why the Senate as a body cannot conduct itself as wisely and properly as it can in any other attitude or under any other circumstances. I was opposed, therefore, to every resolution of this kind. I am perfectly willing, at the same time, so far as I am concerned, to agree that no other subject shall come before the Senate except that which the majority of this body regard as the important subject, and the only one for which they have convened.

Setting out with the position that I am opposed to the resolution because I regard it as an infringement on the rights of every member of this body, and as very improper in itself—this is my individual opinion—there is one other consideration I wish to present. I shall vote for this amendment, believing that the Senators who live on the borders and who are more conversant with the state of things there than I am represent the true condition of the facts there; and if they think anything can be done to mitigate the asperities of the Indian warfare there, I am willing to aid in doing it. I do not propose here to inquire whether the Indians are right or whether we are right. Perhaps the report which has been referred to is perfectly correct. I am willing to believe that it is so; if you please, I am willing to admit that we have been to blame in this matter; I do not choose to controvert that statement; but if I understand these Senators, this state of facts exists, that the Indians are slaughtering the women and children of the frontier, that they are obstructing the Government of the United States, that they are obstructing our public works. Now, the only question for us to solve is, have our military commanders there adequate force to afford that protection which the citizens require and demand?

Again, sir, if our citizens are trespassing upon the Indians and committing depredations on them, is it not the duty of our commanders to arrest that state of things and to see that our treaty stipulations are carried out? Have they force adequate to do that? I do not believe they have, for if they had I think they would use it, and use it efficiently. The fact that they have not arrested these wars, the fact that they have not stopped the depredations that are being committed on our public works, is proof sufficient to me that they need additional force. I consider it the duty of Congress at the present time to extend to them every aid which is necessary, and I do not think we can shut our eyes to the state of facts which has been represented here by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. HENDERSON.] Under the very statement he has made here to-day, it is our duty to consider this subject and to extend to our commanders on the borders every facility we possibly can, so as to enable them to suppress these depredations. At present I do not know what can be done; but I apprehend something can be done, and that, too, without hazarding a very extensive or a very expensive Indian war.

Under this state of facts I feel bound to vote for this amendment, because I consider it proper and right, and I cannot discharge my duty conscientiously without voting for it. I regard the original resolution as an infringement of the rights of every Senator, and particularly of my own rights.

Mr. WADE, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) Mr. President, I have opposed this resolution, and I have voted for an amendment entirely incompatible with it. My general course in the Senate, however, is in all cases where nothing but matters of expediency are involved, to conform to the wishes of a majority of the party with whom I usually act. But there are some questions, in my judgment, about which a Senator has no right to conform his view to that of the majority, and I take this resolution to be one of that class. In that I may be entirely mistaken; but certainly this is, in my judgment, one of the most dangerous precedents that the Senate could possibly set for itself. It has been the policy of this body, so far as I know, at all times, to oppose all attempts to limit even debate upon subjects. We have no previous question. We suffer a great deal undoubtedly from extended debate, unnecessary debate, but this body has never thought it best to limit it at all. But here you not only propose to limit debate, but to limit the very subject of debate, to deprive the representative of a State of the right of bringing forward for the consideration of the Senate those questions that his constituents may instruct him to bring here. I have no right to disregard the will of my constituents and say that I will vote for a measure that will prevent me from bringing their wishes before this body. At least I think so; and if I supposed I had a right to do it, I should believe, as I said before, that it was a most dangerous precedent. How would a minority in this body like such a rule as this in high party times? Gentlemen might come in here and say, "We have determined at this session that you shall bring forward only just such measures as we see fit that you shall act on; we limit you by rules of this body to certain definite and specified subjects for consideration; and others you shall not touch, however important your constituents may consider them." A State may consider that she has the highest interests to be brought forward by her representatives in this body for the consideration of the body, and yet if a resolution of this kind can be adopted, maintained, and enforced here, you strike dumb the mouth of your constituents, no petition upon any subject however important can be brought before the body; nor can a representative here state its importance, although his constituents may regard it to be vital.

Sir, I can go for no such resolution as this, and I think it totally idle and unnecessary. I believe it will extend your session infinitely almost if you adopt it; for it will take longer to ascertain what comes within the limit of such a crude resolution as this than it would be to debate all the subjects presented. You will find it will be a constant subject of debate whether whatever measure is sought to be brought forward here comes within this rule or not. It confines us to measures of reconstruction, a question as wide as the ocean. I do not know what may not be brought here under that head and be said to be upon the subject of reconstruction. Certainly I should judge the measure of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] which is to give universal suffrage by act of Congress, to be upon the subject of reconstruction, and I think one of the most efficient measures to that end; and yet gentlemen seem to suppose that that is within the scope of the excluding clause of this resolution. There may be measures standing out so palpably apart from the subject of reconstruction that we can see that we are not allowed to take them under such a resolution. We would not go into matters of finance. We would not go into matters of military concern, perhaps; and yet the military affairs of the Government are so intimately connected with the subject of reconstruction that I hardly know where you could draw the line.

I do not think the resolution will accomplish the object that Senators wish to attain by it; but if there were no other reason than this for not conforming to the conclusion of the majority, as I understand they have consulted on the subject and come to this conclusion, I should forego the opinion I entertain as to its expediency and vote for it; but when I see that it deprives a Senator of the right to bring forward a measure that he deems important, and to urge it upon the consideration of Congress; when I see that it deprives a State of the power to instruct its Representatives what to do; when I see that it not only cuts off debate, but limits the subjects of debate; when I see that it sets a precedent of the greatest danger in high party times that would shut out the minority entirely from the consideration of any of those subjects that they might deem important, I cannot consent to vote for it. I ask my friends here who were in this body years ago, when we were in a lean minority, how they would have felt if the ingenuity of our enemies had then conjured up such a rule as this, and they had been told "You shall not debate the subject of slavery, you shall not present a petition, you shall offer no bill upon the subject, you shall not agitate it at all in the body." It would have been a mighty convenient thing for them; and it may be so again.

Sir, I do hope that no such precedent will be set; that no such detriment to a minority will ever be successfully urged here. I can view it in no other light. This is almost the first time where when consultations have been had by my friends and a majority of them have arrived at a conclusion, I have differed with them; but I cannot see that I have a right to agree to this proposition, inasmuch as it deprives my constituents of the right of bringing forward through their Senators such measures as they deem important. You may reject their measures, but you cannot, consistently with the rights of a Senator on this floor, turn your backs upon what he sees fit to bring forward.

For these reasons I shall vote against the resolution; and I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I do not see the danger that the honorable Senator from Ohio does in the course proposed to be adopted. It is undoubtedly the right of the majority of the body, whatever may be the consequences, to decide what shall be the order of business, what business shall be taken up, and what business shall be omitted; and to say that subjects other than those desirable to be considered shall be laid upon the table, and not considered. The power that the majority has over the business of the body in these particulars is unlimited. The danger of the precedent is, as in all other cases, that a majority may abuse its power; it may go too far; it may outrage the rights of the minority; but for all that it is responsible to the people; and if it does abuse its power, if it does outrage the rights of the minority, if it does exclude from consideration subjects that ought to be considered, it is responsible to the people, and the people will change that majority into a minority; and there is the remedy. But to say that the majority has not the right to decide at its own will and pleasure upon what business shall be done, and how it shall be done, and when it shall be done, is disputing a right which has been recognized in all legislative bodies so long as legislative bodies have existed; and in our system the remedy is a simple one and a rapid one, with the changes that the people can make in the representation at any time they see fit to do it.

Why, sir, the other House has already passed a rule substantially the same as this, as I understand; I have not read it. Have they violated the rights of the people? Sir, this is always the argument which you hear; a minority does not like to be a minority. If gentlemen happen to be in a minority and it does not suit them, then there is a cry of a violation of rights, and that there is danger in the precedent; the wisdom of the majority, and the patriotism of the majority, and the good sense of the majority, are such that they cannot be relied upon at all against the wisdom of a minority, though the relative numbers may be twenty-six against six, for example, according to the vote we took a few minutes ago.

Now, sir, I apprehend that the business of the country and the business of the Senate and the interests of the people are as safe in the hands of the large majority of this Senate as they are in the hands of a minority, and that we hear quite enough about the violations of our duties, and quite enough about the dangers arising from the violations of our duties, because we cannot see with the eyes of others. Certainly, we hear as much of this as is respectful to the majority, if it happens to be addressed to the majority. But, sir, that is not the argument. The Senator from Ohio was not present at the consultation. He speaks of what he has hitherto done. Hitherto, I suppose, he has generally acted with the majority, and it has been mighty satisfactory to him; but now he does not happen to be responsible, for he was not present.

The Senator from Wisconsin denounces this resolution as a crime. Who is to judge? Is it a crime if, when a proposition is brought forward in this body, the body at once votes that it be postponed to the consideration of the next session of Congress? And yet, what is this but saying that all subjects save one shall be postponed to the consideration of the next session of Congress? It includes a larger mass, but the principle is the same. What right have we to say, when a petition is presented, that it shall be laid upon the table and not referred? It is a crime because somebody's constituents have requested that that petition shall be presented. What right have we to say, when a bill is offered, that that bill shall without consideration be postponed to a future session of Congress for action? Simply the right of exercising our own judgments and taking our own responsibilities, nothing more. Because this resolution happens to include more than that the principle is not changed in the slightest possible degree; the responsibility is greater; and if the larger number of individuals choose to take it they have a right to take it, and they are not to be denounced as committing a crime for so doing. They must judge for themselves in reference to that matter. But, sir, what I complain of in this particular is this: when gentlemen go into consultation with their friends and make no protest whatever against having the result of that consultation acted upon, they agree impliedly and expressly, in my judgment, that they will be bound on that subject by the decision which their friends came to, unless they give notice to the contrary; that is to say, in case they continue to act on the subject to the end. It has been always so hitherto; and what I say now is simply, with all respect to gentlemen, that if they did not mean to be bound by the decision of their friends, they should not have gone into the consultation.

Mr. SUMNER. Who knew what was to be the subject of the consultation? I did not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator certainly knew before we got through, and before he voted and found himself in a minority.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; why did he vote then if he did not mean to be bound by the majority?

Mr. SUMNER. I will answer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why did he defer it until he found that he was not in a majority and then say he is not bound? The time of taking the exception is what I allude to.

But, sir, on such matters every gentleman must judge for himself. I impute nothing to anybody. I have stated what my opinion is; I conceive myself under that obligation; and now I say that gentlemen who differ with me on that point, if they act upon the conclusion which they seem to have come to, advertise me that if ever I go into a consultation with them and find myself in a minority, I am at liberty, after I have voted and agreed to submit the subject to a vote, to come out and say, "My conscience impels me to violate my plighted word!" My conscience does not act in that direction, sir. Other gentlemen can do as they please.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I should not have said another word on this occasion but for some of the topics that have been introduced by the Senator from Maine; but before I allude to those particularly, allow me to answer his argument so far as I am able to appreciate it. He will pardon me for saying that he confounds right and power. Unquestionably the Senate has the power which the Senator from Maine attributes to it; but it has not the right. A jury, as we know according to a familiar illustration, in giving the general verdict has power to say "guilty" or "not guilty," and disregard the instructions of the court, but I need not say that it is a grave question among lawyers whether it has the right. Now, I submit that assuming that the Senate has the power which the Senator from Maine claims for it, it has not the right. It has not the right to disregard the spirit of the Constitution; and the proposition now before you is of that character. The Senator from Maine does not see it so, I know, for if he did he could not give to it the weight of his character and support. Others do see it so; and if they do see it so, the Senator from Maine must pardon them if they act on the lights that are given to them. The Senator would not vote for a proposition that he regarded as hostile to the spirit of the Constitution. I think too highly of him to attribute to him any such conduct. Can he expect others to do what he surely would not do himself? This is my answer to the argument so far as I understood it. Perhaps I do not do justice to it; yet I try to.

There was still one other point of argument, according to my recollection. The Senate, so the Senator argues, may postpone an individual measure to the next session. Grant it: does it follow that they may postpone, immediately on their arrival and opening the business of a session, the whole business to another session?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They can adjourn on the next day, or on the day they meet, if they please.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I agree with the Senator; but so long as they continue in session as a Senate, then I say under the Constitution of the United States they must attend to the public business of the country. They cannot tie their hands in advance by any such resolution as is now proposed. To do so is to violate the spirit of the Constitution. The Senator from Maine cannot have forgotten the Atherton gag, to which I referred before, without naming it, however. How was it regarded at the time? Was it not justly an offense and a stench in the nostrils of every patriot citizen? Has it not left a bad name upon the successive Congresses that recognized it? What was that? It was simply a declaration that they would not receive petitions on one certain subject; and now, under the lead of the Senator from Maine, we are to continue in session an indefinite time and to receive no petition, no bill, nothing on anything except on one specified subject. Now, I submit, if the Atherton gag was unconstitutional, if it was odious, if it was a bad precedent, then you are very rash in going forward now and establishing this much broader precedent. Do not condemn the offensive legislation of the past; do not condemn those slave-masters who were once so offensive in these Chambers; you tear a leaf out of their book and print it in capital letters; you go further than they: you out-Atherton Atherton; you impose a gag not upon petitions merely, but upon everything else, except on one subject.

The Senator from Ohio has, with unanswerable force, depicted the offensive character of this precedent, and he has taught us how, now that we are a majority, we should hesitate to set such an example for the future. How should we feel, he has aptly reminded us, if, as a minority, we had such a cup handed to our lips by a patriot Senator? Surely we should have felt that for the time patriotism had departed.

As I have said, I should not have been betrayed into these remarks now but for other topics that were introduced by the Senator from Maine. When I opened this debate this morning, Senators will bear me witness, I made no allusion to any consideration or discussion elsewhere. I did not think a caucus a proper subject to be introduced into this Chamber; nor did I attribute to it anything of the character which the Senator from Maine does. He makes it not merely a sacred, but a sacro-sanct pact, by which every one who was at the meeting is solemnly bound. Why, sir, what authority can there be for any such conclusion? I allude to it now, in detail, because it has been introduced into the debate; bear me witness, I did not introduce it. Senators went to that caucus, I presume, like myself, without knowing what was to be considered; and let me confess, when the proposition, in its first form, was presented, I was startled by its offensive character. I could not believe that a Senator, knowing the responsibilities and duties of a Senator, and who had taken the oath of a Senator, could introduce such a proposition. Well, sir, discussion went on. The proposition was amended, modified, mitigated, lost something of its offensiveness in form, but it still remained substantially offensive. During the discussion, I am not aware that any Senator suggested that it should be adopted as a rule of the Senate. If any one did, I did not hear it, though I paid close attention to the discussion. I do not think the Senator from Maine made any such suggestion. I certainly never supposed that anybody would propose such a rule to the Senate. So far as it was to have any value, I supposed it was to be the recorded result of the deliberations of political associates, which should be, so far as practicable, a guide for their action, but not to be embodied in a perpetual record to the dishonor of this Republic. I did not suppose it. When at the last moment, after the vote had been declared, to which the Senator from Maine refers, and to which I should have made no allusion if he had not brought it forward, I rose in the caucus and said, "I will not be bound by any such proposition." When it had arrived at the stage to which I refer, the Senator from Maine will not forget it, for he interposed a remark which I will not quote now—

Mr. FESSENDEN. You had better quote it. I said, "Then you should not have voted on the subject if you did not mean to be bound by the decision of the majority."

Mr. SUMNER. To which I replied, "I am a Senator of the United States."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not hear the reply.

Mr. SUMNER. It was the reply made with a loud voice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not hear it.

Mr. SUMNER. I replied, "I am a Senator of the United States." What did I mean by it? Precisely what the Senator from Ohio, the Vice President of the United States, has so ably developed to-day; that as a Senator of the United States I had no right to come into this Chamber and barter away the rights of the people of the United States."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did you say that?

Mr. SUMNER. I say I replied that I was a Senator of the United States; and what did I mean by that? That my obligations as a Senator were above any vote in a caucus; that I had no right to go into any caucus and barter away unquestioned rights on this floor. We are all under obligations here to discharge our duties as Senators. We cannot in advance go forward and tie our hands. I have not said in so many words, "You violate the Constitution in doing it." Perhaps better reflection would lead me to adopt the stronger language and say, you violate the Constitution of the United States. I feel plainly, clearly, beyond doubt, that such is the character of the Constitution of the United States, and such are our obligations under it, that we cannot without a dereliction of duty adopt a proposition like that which we are now asked to agree to. So I see it; I cannot see it otherwise. And now I submit to my associates and colleagues in this body, with whom I am proud to act, whose good judgments I value, whether they would have me, feeling about this proposition as I do, seeing it as I do, act otherwise than as I do. Should I not come forward and frankly, as one of your associates and brothers, anxious for the good name of this Senate to which we all belong, proud of this Republic whose honor we hope to bear aloft, and anxious that no precedent should be established which may hereafter be brought to our detriment, should I not come forward and enter my protest; and in doing so should I be exposed to some of the rude suggestions that I have encountered? Should I be told that one may not go into a caucus and assist in the debate on such a proposition, and then not appear again in this Chamber except with the bands of the caucus upon his hands; for that is the suggestion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will please not misrepresent me.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator says, "You may not go into caucus and assist in the debate." That I do not object to; but you may not in my judgment go into a consultation—call it a caucus or what you will—where the implied obligation is that the question under consideration is to be settled by a majority, and not only debate but vote, and then, finding yourself in a minority, say, "I am not bound."

Mr. SUMNER. And then when at the last moment the proposition is brought forward to make it a rule of the Senate, I solemnly protest. When could I have protested?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not protest until after he votes and finds himself in a minority. Then he protests.

Mr. SUMNER. No; I think the Senator should—

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; the vote was taken.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, vote or no vote, it makes no difference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is what I complain of.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, that is what the Senator complains of. I say it makes no difference. No caucus could constrain any person on such a question. It was our duty to stay in that caucus and resist the offensive proposition to the last, and then afterward wash our hands of it. Senators, if they choose, may take it in their hands and bear it into this Chamber, and try to enshrine it in the rules of this body. If it is placed there I know it will do no good; it will stay there to the dishonor of this country and as a bad precedent for the future.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, as I expect to vote on this subject, and as the discussion has taken a very broad range, I desire in a very few words to state the ground of my vote.

As to what the obligations of the caucus are, that is a question which each gentleman I suppose must necessarily always settle for himself, and on that subject I have nothing to say.

If this proposition, that which is offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, were introduced at an ordinary session, while the Senate would certainly have the power to adopt it, I should agree with the Senator from Ohio that it would be a very bad precedent, that it would be an improper exercise of power, that it would be depriving the people of their rights, that it would be taking from the Senate many of its attributes, and would be highly reprehensible. But that does not happen to be the case by any means. By the very framework of our Government, from the 4th of March to the first Monday of December of each alternate year the people of this country have agreed that they will not have the benefit of a session of Congress. This is that alternate year, and this is that period. So we certainly do not violate the framework of our Government if we withhold from the people, during the period that they have agreed that they will forego it, the blessing of our legislation.

This is an extraordinary session, a most extraordinary one. Nobody expected any session of Congress here now. It is by reason of a strange opinion that has been given by the law officer of the Government in reference to the legislation adopted at our last session, when we thought that we established a military power, when we thought we made the governments of the so-called rebel States subordinate to that military power, but to our surprise find that we established these governments and made the military power of this country a mere police force. That is what has brought us together here; that is the one thing, nothing else. And what do we propose? We propose that the business of this session of Congress shall be confined to the one subject that brought us here, and in that all the people concur. Public sentiment—I think I may invoke it—calls upon us to discharge that duty, and then to retire. I do not see that we rob the Senate of its attributes by this proposition, any more than we rob the Senate of its attributes when we set down a special business for a particular day. Instead of its being for a particular day, it is for the week or ten days that we may be here, having come here to attend to that particular business and that alone.

We have had here this morning a discussion in reference to the Indian question; and what does it all amount to. There is not a Senator here that has a proposition to make as to legislation: that is to say, the whole debate did not draw out a single proposition as to the legislation in reference to the Indians. If there is any need of legislation, and if it shall be stated, the same vote which passes this rule can relieve the rule so as to admit of that legislation.

I trust that the Senate will adhere to its purpose of transacting the business for which we assembled here, the business which the public expect us to attend to and nothing else.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I should not have undertaken to say anything upon the question now before the Senate but for the wide range which the debate has taken, and for the statements which have been made here in the Senate with regard to the consultation that took place among the Senators composing the majority. As I shall have to vote upon this resolution, I wish to say a few words in explanation of the course which I shall take.

When that consultation began, it is quite true, as stated by Senators already in this discussion, that no one knew what was to be the subject-matter of the consultation. It went on, and the final action of the members present was had embodying a proposition the substance of which is now before the Senate in the resolution pending. It was not until after that proposition was adopted that anything was said whatever, formally or informally, that I remember, about introducing such a proposition into the Senate as that which has been introduced to-day; and I was completely taken by surprise when, after the main proposition had been adopted, a second proposition was made that that should be introduced into the Senate and offered as a resolution here. I voted against it.

And now, sir, I have thought, with a great deal of anxiety this morning, as to the course which it is proper for me to pursue here in reference to this resolution. I have listened to the arguments which have been advanced by Senators, and I have come to the conclusion that the whole of that consultation was a mistake, so far as it could have any binding operation or force on our action as Senators in this body. I did not go into the consultation expecting that the results of it would be presented here in the shape of a formal resolution to be binding upon this body. I do not think any such thing should have been done. I am of the opinion that it is altogether wrong that we should undertake thus to bind ourselves. I was not of that opinion day before yesterday; subsequent reflection and conviction, and what has been said on the floor of the Senate, have convinced me that it is wrong to do that thing. I therefore feel constrained by a sense of duty to give my vote against the proposition that is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am not so familiar with the history of this country as I wish I was. I do not know whether it has ever happened hitherto in the history of the country that a Senator has been arraigned before the Senate for a violation of a duty to a partisan caucus. If there ever has been such a trial before, I hope there never will be such a trial again. It seems to me that whatever a political partisan may do in violation of his duty to his party should be heard and determined by the councils of his party alone, and that one of the constitutional tribunals of the nation, constituted, I suppose, for very different purposes, should not be obstructed with hearing such causes or such complaints. Still, as the cause has been dragged here, I thought it proper to say a few words in defense of myself, being one of the delinquents and compelled to be here. In reply to the few remarks that I made at that time, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has offered some suggestions, in reference to which I have but two criticisms to make: first, that so far as he replied to myself, he replied to an argument which I think I never made; and second, that his reply did not seem to me very conclusive. He represented me as having denounced this measure before the Senate as a crime. I do not think I did indulge in any such denunciation. If I did, I wish to take it back. I certainly do not regard it to be a crime at the common law, and I know of no statute which defines it to be a crime. Besides, if it were to be indicted as a crime, I am bound to suppose the prosecution would fail for another reason. I do not suppose the prosecution would be able to establish the fact of a criminal intent. So I did not mean to denounce it as a crime, and I do not think I did denounce it as a crime. That it seems to me to have some of the elements of a crime I will not deny. I did undertake to say, and in a few words to show, that I thought it changed the character of this body: that it deprived it of its essential features and attributes. I cannot help thinking so. I was not ambitious of proving it, and I would not urge a word further in support of that idea if it were not necessary, or did not seem to be necessary, to my own vindication.

This body in which we now sit and reason together is one of the coordinate elements of the Legislature of the country. It is a body in which I, moved by any portion of the people of the United States, may offer a petition, a memorial, a remonstrance to-morrow or any day of our sitting. It is one in which I may offer, upon one day's notice a bill which I or any portion of my constituency or any portion of our common people may think necessary for the redress of a public grievance, or the redress of a private wrong. That is what the body is to-day, and what it will be if you do not pass this resolution. It does not follow, because I offer this petition, that its prayer must be granted. It does not follow, because I offer this bill, that the Senate must agree to it. You never do any such thing. When I offer a petition, in order that you may be advised whether its prayer should be granted or not, you direct its reference—to whom? To one of the committees of your body, supposed to be specially adapted to the work of investigating that question and determining whether it should be granted or not. When I offer a bill you refer it to one of the committees of this body to whom it pertains. Why? To be advised by the investigations of that committee whether it be proper to consider that bill or not. What will be the Senate if you adopt this resolution? Without the advice of any of your committees, I have got—and so has every other member—to procure the assent of a majority of the Senate before a bill can be introduced for its consideration in some way, and the way I do not and cannot possibly understand. I have got to get the Senate to hear a bill which you will not allow to be introduced; and I have got to induce you to hear it and to assent to it before I can get it here into the door of the Senate Chamber. And then you propose to call this the Senate after that is done.

Mr. President, this proposition has been likened to the setting down of a bill to be heard on a particular day. It bears no possible similitude to that; or if it does I cannot see it. While you are here you must—it is a proper act of legislation, it is a proper act of deliberation—regulate the order in which you will transact the public business. You cannot hear but one bill at a time; and you do not wrong the country, unless you misjudge; when you say, "We will hear this bill to-day, and consider the other bill to-morrow," or vice versa. That is a proper act of legislation. It is no improper act of legislation to say by resolution that you will give the preference to this or that measure over any other; and let me say right here that that is the furthest which, as I understand the precedents, any Senate or any House has ever gone before. The very precedent introduced by the Senator from Maine as authority for this is no precedent, if I do not greatly misunderstand it. In that resolution the Senate did not say they would hear one measure or one set of measures to the exclusion of others. They said they would hear them in preference to other measures. This proposes to say on an ordinary session of the Legislature that they will hear one measure to the exclusion of all other measures.

But gentlemen say that this is not an ordinary session of the Legislature, that it is an extraordinary session of Congress. I do not so understand it. The Senator from New Jersey reminds us that those who framed the Government did not contemplate a session of the Legislature at this time, that in fact they agreed not to have it. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think they simply agreed that in alternate years the regular sessions should commence on the first Monday of December unless Congress otherwise directed, and I do understand that Congress provided for the assembling of this Legislature in ordinary session on the 4th of March last. I have the act before me:

"That in addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States and of each succeeding Congress thereafter at twelve o'clock, meridian, on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected."

How can this be called an extraordinary session when your statutes provide for just such a session, commencing on the very same day at the commencement of every succeeding Congress after this? And you have never agreed, Mr. President, that the business of this session was concluded. Whenever that time comes you have an undoubted right to say so, say so upon the official responsibility of each one of your members. That you have never said; but on a certain day some weeks ago—I do not remember on what day you did agree to adjourn the two Houses until the 3d day of July. That is what you agreed to do. You agreed that there was then no such urgent necessity for legislation but what you might adjourn the two Houses until the 3d day of July. The 3d day of July came. You did not know that there would be a quorum of the two Houses here, and in view of that contingency, you provided in that act that if a quorum did not appear on that day the Presiding Officer of each House might further adjourn the Legislature until, I think, the first Monday in December. So that we never have deliberately decided to close the business of this first session of the Fortieth Congress. I must submit, therefore, that this is an ordinary session of Congress. But, then, I agree with all my friends about me, that there is one question which I deem of paramount importance. It is excepted in the resolution submitted here by the Senator from Rhode Island. Whenever we are called upon to act upon that subject I am willing to act on that to the exclusion of all others; but when there is nothing to be done upon that subject, I ask why in the name of Heaven the Congress of the United States, paid for three hundred and sixty-five days' work in every year, should sit here with its arms folded waiting for some legislation to be prepared upon that subject, doing nothing; and it may be with large bodies of the American people who pay us these salaries clamoring at our doors for us to act.

What answer shall we give them? No answer is suggestive to us except the fact that a caucus has somewhere sometime agreed that we will not do anything except upon one question.

Now, as I said before, I disclaim the idea of this being a crime. The Senator from Maine is mistaken as to my grievance. He assumes that we are not willing to be a minority. Why, sir, I was never more willing to be in a minority in my life than I am on this very question. I was perfectly content to be in a minority, if the Senator would let me be in a minority; I would have been there and would have been perfectly quiet, but I thought he was not disposed to allow me the right to be in the minority, that he denied to me that poor privilege, as he concedes it to be. I should not have said a word but for the fact that it was said here, and as I thought very inopportunistically, that this matter had been considered and adjudicated, and all true disciples—I claim to be one—were bound to follow the adjudication, and do it silently and unquestioningly. As I happened to be one of those who felt that this was a question on which a caucus had no right to guide my action, and as I said at the time that I could not be guided by it before I voted, and not after I voted, I felt bound to say to the Senate why I could not vote for this resolution. I did stay and vote after I had made that declaration to my fellows, to my compatriots. I say so, for it seems that caucus must be brought before the Senate and canvassed. The Senator from Maine, I understand, thinks I should have withdrawn. No, I think not: Being so ardently attached to the welfare of the Republican party as I am, I thought it was my business to stay there and keep my Republican friends off what I thought a rock, on which they might possibly split; and I know it is not a small shoal that can knock the Republican organization to pieces; but then I thought I would try to keep them off, not merely by the few words I said, but by the vote I gave. I did not understand at the time I gave that vote that I was cutting myself off from the right of private judgment thereafter, and I think it is a new rule. But as I said once before I must say again upon this and all other party questions, I hold myself amenable to the party whose law I am supposed to have violated, and not to the Senate, for as yet I have violated no rule of the Senate.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I certainly do not desire to protract this discussion; but having taken the position that I did in the earlier part of it, I desire now to explain the vote that I shall give upon the pending amendment. I would remark, however, by way of prelude that I should have considered the arguments of the honorable Senator from Missouri and the honorable Senator from Ohio and other Senators as very proper in the consultation which we had when we were discussing the question whether we would adopt this resolution or not. It is idle to say that we did not understand what we were going to discuss on the meeting of that consultation. It is idle to say that we did not intend to be governed by the deliberations of that body. Those of us who are familiar with the consultations of party caucuses, if you choose to call them so, understand distinctly that when we go into caucus upon any question to ascertain what the will of the majority of that body is, we meet for the purpose of acting together in favor of the will of that majority. The arguments which gentlemen offer are, I confess, good against caucuses altogether. I have always been opposed to caucuses; I am now; they often subvert the will of the people; but after we have deliberated together as a party, and a majority have decided then to say that we are not bound by that decision in introducing a new rule into the well-known history of American politics.

Sir, there is no speech that is a good speech which is not applicable to the facts of the case we are considering. When the honorable Senator from Ohio with his great prestige talks about our having surrendered our rights, the rights of our States, the right of petition, and every right that is dear to our people; and when the honorable Senator from Massachusetts chooses to characterize the proceedings of such a body as we have by the designation of the Atherton gag, I cannot but think that—

"Resembles ocean into tempest wrought
To waft a feather or to drown a fly."

I do not allow the honorable Senators from Ohio, or from Wisconsin, or from Massachusetts to magnify the facts of the case. The facts are plain and simple. There is no question of the surrender of the great and inalienable rights of the American citizen or the American Senator. What are the facts? We had our session of Congress, and we were afraid that the President of the United States would thwart the objects of Congress, and we concluded to hold ourselves in position to do what? To pass new laws, to have new legislation, to do something which we were not intending to do at the time? No, sir; but we agreed to hold ourselves in position to maintain and support what the Congress of the United States had done. That was the object of this session of Congress. That was what I contended for, and what the honorable Senator from Ohio contended for. But now instead of coming here these hot days and doing what we intended to do, carrying out the object for which the session was called, it is proposed to make this a regular, long, protracted session of Congress, embracing every subject of legislation.

I say I do not allow the honorable Senator from Ohio or from Massachusetts, or any other Senator to magnify the facts of the case and to hold me responsible for surrendering my rights and my opinions, or the rights and opinions of my State. I confine them to the simple issue, to the simple question in the case. I say that the American people was pleased with the action of Congress. I say that it was working well, that it will work well, and that we shall come near reconstructing the Government under that policy if it is carried out.

Now, sir, as a Senator, I am willing to stand by and support in the main, almost in every particular, the action of the consultations of my party friends. There may be, however, after the action of a caucus, such a thing as further information showing the necessity for something not considered in the deliberations of that caucus. I cannot object, for instance, on this occasion to the exception proposed by the honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. Ross,] and the honorable Senators from Nebraska, and those men who live in the immediate vicinity of the Indian disturbances which have recently broken out. I think the exception they propose is one which we may well make, and one which every one in the caucus would recognize, as was stated by the Senator from Rhode Island in his first speech. I do it upon the ground that it is something we have to recognize; it is something that is superior to the decrees of Senates and the decisions of caucuses. I mean a state of war. If Congress is in session during the existence of war, we cannot ignore that question. Therefore, as a Senator, if I choose to make this exception, believing it a good one as I do, and vote for this amendment, in view of that state of war which now exists, I do not mean thereby to take, and I never will take, the ground which has been assumed in this debate, that we are not bound by the deliberations which we as Senators hold when we get together. Why do we get together? Why do we argue at all? Why do we have a caucus at all? What do we go there for unless to ascertain the opinions of the majority, and to act in accordance with those opinions? Now, sir, there is one of two things, and it commences this day: that the decisions of such consultations have to be carried out, or this day begins the death of any consultations by the majority in the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, it is evident that this debate has opened a broader question than we imagined at first. Doctors disagree.

The learned Senator from Illinois differs from the learned Senator from Maine. One expounds the obligations of the caucus in one way and the other in another. Now, I am clear that this ought not to be brought to a close without some defined code of caucus, and it seems to me that the learned Senators who are so swift to judge others who cannot accept the conclusions of the recent caucus, ought to supply us with this code. It should be reduced to a text. We should know to what extent one is bound, and what not; whether the Senator from Illinois who refuses to be bound by the caucus in one point, which was fully discussed, is a man of honor; whether another Senator who refuses to be bound on other points is a man of honor. That question could be settled, it seems to me, by some explicit code in advance, for we have been admonished in the debate that we cannot differ from the caucus without a departure from propriety, if not from duty; and I do not know that some stronger language has not been employed. If it has I will not quote it. However, it seems to me that this should lead us to a practical conclusion, and it is this: to have nothing to do with a proposition which can only be discussed through such avenues, which requires such refinement of detail, with regard to which the Senator from Illinois makes one exception, and other Senators other exceptions, and to which other Senators entirely object. Now, I am at a loss to understand how a Senator who says—I wrote down his words here—"that no Senator can be superior to the decrees of caucus;" those were words of my excellent friend. I am at a loss to know how he can undertake to graft an amendment upon a proposition born of a caucus brought in the arms of our President into the very presence of the "Conscript Fathers," and here laid before us. I am astonished that he should undertake to vote for any change in that proposition after the avowals he has made.

Mr. YATES. What are the words?

Mr. SUMNER. The words I took down, are that no one should set himself up as superior to the decrees of a caucus. Those were the words of the Senator as I wrote them down. Now I am not going to complain of the Senator. I believe he is doing right; but then I wish him to understand that other Senators on this floor may have the same privilege that he claims for himself, justly and worthily claims; it is his title. I recognize the Senator as a man of honor, though he does refuse to carry out the decrees of the caucus. I believe that every Senator here has his responsibilities as a Senator, which are above any he can have to a caucus. What is a caucus? It is a meeting of friends for consultation and for harmony, where each gives up something with a view to a common result; but no man gives up a principle; no man gives up anything that is vital. No Senator can expect another Senator to give up anything that is vital. No Senator can expect another Senator to sacrifice a principle. I will not imagine that any Senator would sacrifice a principle. If a Senator expects another to accord with him under the sanction of a caucus, I know full well it is because he does not see it in the light of principle; but if another Senator does see it in the light of principle, how can he be expected to act otherwise than according to his light? It is not given to all to see with the same clearness that some of the caucus defenders unquestionably have. Theirs, I know, is the pathway of light; they see the obligation as completed. Others cannot see it so. I am in that list. I cannot see it as a final obligation. For one I have been present in many caucuses, and I believe, looking over the past, I have harmonized reasonably with my associates. Sometimes I have been obliged to differ from them and have expressed that difference, and it has generally been received with kindness. The other day I expressed the same difference, little expecting, however, an arraignment on this floor. But now my excellent friend from Illinois opens the door to all of us most generously to vote against the resolution or any amendment to the resolution, just as on our conscience we please. The Senator from Illinois is too good a Senator not to know the obligations of a Senator, and he would not seek to put any member of this body in a straight-jacket according to the rules of a caucus.

Mr. YATES. They put themselves there.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says they put themselves there; but suppose they feel as the Senator from Illinois now feels, that the proposition which was adopted in the caucus was not a good one. That is the conclusion of the Senator. He proposes to sustain an amendment to it; he sets aside the conclusion of the caucus. Can the Senator claim for himself anything that he would not accord to another?

Mr. YATES. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will just say in reply to that, that it is republican that the majority shall rule, and in yielding to that principle I do not surrender any right that I have. If I agree to be governed by the decision of the majority, I do not consider that I am surrendering my rights. That is the position I assume. If a Senator goes into a consultation whereby it is implied that he shall be governed by the majority, and the question under consideration is decided against him, and he then acts with the majority, I consider that he has had every right according to our republican doctrine that the majority shall rule.

Mr. SUMNER. But if I understand my friend from Illinois, he does not accept the conclusion of the caucus; he is going to ingraft an amendment on that same proposition.

Mr. YATES. The honorable Senator will allow me to say that I stated that there were exceptions, inevitable exceptions, and I regarded this case as constituting an exception that was inevitable, that we could not control, that we had no power to control. I said there was a state of war, and we could not ignore the existence of a state of war.

Mr. HOWE. Who has declared war?

Mr. YATES. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin was within a rod and a half of death's door according to his own statement. War already exists in the Territories. I think it is made plain by the honorable Senators from Kansas and Nebraska that a state of war exists there, and I have no doubt our people are being slaughtered in great numbers. Indeed I know that such is the case, for I have been in the midst of these hostilities myself. Such a state of war existing, I say its exigencies are superior to the decrees of Senates or caucuses.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the Senator what legislation it is that he proposes Congress shall adopt in regard to that matter?

Mr. YATES. I am not undertaking to say. I support this amendment because these Senators assure me that these difficulties exist, that we are in a state of war, and that we must make appropriations to protect our people.

Mr. GRIMES. We all know that we have been in a state of war for several months, and we all know, too, that the whole machinery for carrying on war that existed during the recent rebellion is still in existence, that the Secretary of War or the President of the United States has the power to call upon any Governor of a State that he pleases and make a request for troops; and I was told by General Vincent last night that General Sherman has a carte blanche to call upon such Governors as he chooses. What are we going to do? What more can we do?

Mr. THAYER. On that very point allow me to say that I had a conversation with General Sherman, and he told me he could call on the Governors for troops; but, said he, "I cannot promise them that they will ever get a dollar of pay to meet the expenses." That is the difficulty. He told me he was met at every turn with that difficulty.

Mr. YATES. I had a conversation with General Sherman upon this subject; and if I understood him, his policy was not to put down this Indian uprising by the regular Army, but by a volunteer force.

Mr. GRIMES. Has he not a right to call for it?

Mr. YATES. As I understand the honorable Senator from Iowa, he says that it can be called out now. I know not how that is. I know myself that is the only way to put down Indian disturbances.

Mr. GRIMES. So far as money is concerned there are several hundred millions of dollars now at the disposal of the Secretary of War, from old appropriations that have not lapsed into the Treasury.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, when I was interrupted by my friend from Illinois—and I am always glad to be interrupted by him or by any other friend—I was considering the value of the caucus decision which has been brought forward into this Chamber, and I was calling attention to the difference among the doctors on the subject. The Senator from Illinois rises and gives us a further exposition. He says that he is in favor of the amendment to the pending proposition in order to meet something that is inevitable. That is his phrase now. The danger is inevitable, and therefore he will make an exception to the caucus vote. That very point was made in the caucus. The whole caucus has been so thoroughly exhibited to the Senate that I have no hesitation in declaring that. This whole subject of the danger from Indians was considered there, and some of the other topics which I have noticed, and in the face of those the caucus came to their conclusion; and now as I understand the Senator, while he upholds the caucus decision, he will yet in this case, which was thoroughly considered in the caucus, accept an amendment. Now, I submit to my excellent friend whether his conclusion does not entirely impair the value of the caucus conclusion except to this extent, where we all agree, that it is an expression of the opinion of our associates in this body calculated naturally to exercise a strong influence on the course of public business, to be received with respect, but not to be imposed upon this Chamber as a rule. I think that the remark of the Senator sustains that conclusion; indeed I cannot see any other inference.

Mr. YATES. Allow me to ask the Senator whether he did not submit himself to the same sort of decision in the reconstruction measures. Those matters were before a caucus and acted upon.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator asks about the reconstruction measure. In the caucus on reconstruction I myself moved the proposition that in the future constitutions of the rebel States the ballot should be required. A division was had in that caucus. I allude to it now because I am interrogated openly in the Senate. A division was had; there were two stand-up votes, and my motion was carried by a vote of 15 to 13. By 15 to 13 in that caucus it was noted that in the pending bill we would require suffrage for all in the future constitutions of the rebel States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And what would you have thought if the thirteen had repudiated that action?

Mr. SUMNER. It would have been a very different thing to repudiate a proposition in favor of human liberty and to repudiate a proposition that is against human liberty. That is just the difference.

Mr. FESSENDEN, (in his seat, in a very low tone of voice, apparently addressing a Senator near him.) Then, it is allowable to lie in one case, and not in another.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator apply that language to any Senator on the floor?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say that is a fair illustration of the remark made by the Senator if there is any obligation whatever. It is a simple statement. I do not mean that the Senator means to state what is untrue. Of course he could not put that construction on it.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not know. I make no allusion ever, except in respect to the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator knows just what I meant by the remark; I did not make it for the reporters; but I say it is an illustration of his remark. When the question is put to the Senator what he would have thought if the thirteen had repudiated it, he says that is a very different thing, being in favor of liberty.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; does not the Senator say the same?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say there is no difference where a man promises to do a thing with a full understanding; he has no right to violate it, whether it is one way or the other.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is whether the man does promise it. There is the point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, then, my reply is that if there was no promise in the case of the thirteen to support the decision there is no promise here; if there was a promise in the case of the thirteen to be bound by it and support it, as they did, then there was a promise here. The Senator may make the distinction if he can.

Mr. SUMNER. I will make the distinction very clear. I have never said myself there was a promise in the case of the thirteen. I discussed it at the time with several friends, and the question was asked by more than one person whether the Senator from Maine was going to sustain the report of the committee on this floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Maine did support it.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. I say the question was asked whether the Senator was going to sustain that report on this floor; and I know that one Senator expressed to me the opinion that the Senator from Maine would not sustain it on this floor. The Senator draws that out from me by his inquiry. Had the Senator on his responsibility felt obliged to come into this Chamber and oppose that report, I should have been pained to find him on the side of human slavery, but I am not ready to say that he would have been constrained even on that proposition by the conclusion of a caucus. I will not say that he would not have been a man of honor had he followed out on this floor his conscience, if it so guided him. I made no such suggestion. No; there is a great exaggeration on this whole question of caucus, and I never have known the exaggeration carried further than it has been to-day.

Here is a proposition brought forward, I may say unexpectedly, almost the accident of an accident. I hesitated myself, a long time, whether to attend the caucus. I was not aware what was to be discussed. Nobody had mentioned to me in advance any subject. I went there; and the discussion went on, crept on, point by point. No human being suggested that we were to be called to make rules for the Senate. The Senator from Maine, as ardent as he was for the proposition, made no such suggestion, at least it did not reach my ears. At the last moment we were told that it was to be a rule of the Senate. I then objected. I am told that I should have objected a minute or two before. Well, that leads me to say that we then need this caucus code, to know precisely when, at what instant of time, the objection is to be made, so that it can be done with honor.

Now, sir, I am tired of this talk on this floor of honor in connection with a matter like this. This is too solemn; we are under too great responsibilities. Every Senator acts with honor. The Senator from Maine acts with honor when he seeks to impose a rule which I think offensive to the spirit of the Constitution. I do not say that he does not act with honor. The Senator from Illinois acts with honor when he says that he will not be bound by the vote of this caucus to a particular extent. Other Senators act with honor when they refuse to be bound by the resolution in any of its terms. Every Senator acts with honor.

He only acts otherwise who makes injurious accusations upon his associates.

Yes, sir, let us have this caucus code; if it is to be administered with such severity, let us know it in advance, its terms and its conditions: what extent of dishonor is to be visited upon those who do not adopt the conclusions of the caucus, and what extent of honor upon those who so steadfastly and violently carry them forward. Let us have the code. I believe, sir, that the true code for the Senate is found in the Constitution of the United States, in the rules of this body, and in the sentiments of right and wrong which animate every honest soul; and I believe that no improper advantage can be taken of any Senator by reminding him that he forbore at a particular moment to register his objection, just as if we were all there on trial, to be saved by speaking promptly. No, sir, it was no such debate; we were there with friends and brothers and associates, each respecting the sensibilities and the convictions of his associates.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am sorry, Mr. President, that I feel called upon to say a word or two more. With regard to the side remarks which I made the Senator cannot, on reflection, suppose I meant to apply it in any other way than to lay down what I thought the natural result would be of the principle that he enunciated and the distinction he attempted to draw between an agreement to act in one way in a case favorable to liberty and an agreement to act in the same way with reference to a case of the contrary description. I think, with all his ingenuity, he can torture it into nothing more than that which I intended to intimate with regard to it, and therefore I made the explanation at the time.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator says that he thinks there should be a code upon this subject, so that all Senators may know when they go into a consultation of friends how far they are bound, and what they can do or can omit afterward consistently of what is considered personal honor. I suggest to the Senator, as he has dwelt upon that subject at length, that there is but one plain guide. There can be no written code of honor as reference to our system, as I never heard there was with regard to what was ordinarily called the code of honor when dueling was more fashionable than it is now, but simply with regard to what is honorable; what there is of it is written in the mind and heart of every individual. He cannot call upon another to guide him; he cannot call upon another to advise him; he knows what that sense requires of him, and he must judge of what it would require of others. He may mis-judge.

Sir, I did not introduce the allusion to the fact that this matter had been consulted upon out of this Chamber. It was alluded to by two Senators before I spoke upon the subject. My friend from Pennsylvania was the first; some one else, I forget who, repeated it. That matter being thus opened, I thought I was at liberty to allude to the same thing, which I did, and I called upon gentlemen to say whether it was strictly in accordance with the usages of friends who meet in consultation of this description, and which I entirely justify and think perfectly proper, and in fact a duty with reference to the business of the Senate. I called upon gentlemen to say whether their proposed action, the speeches they were making, and the objections they were taking were in accordance with that honorable understanding with which every man is supposed to go into a consultation of that kind according to the usages of the Senate and of parties on both sides of the Senate. I made no imputation upon anybody, but I stated my own views, and I left it for them to judge.

Now sir that I defend, and I defend it without any written code. I defend it upon the judgment I form myself with regard to what is binding upon me, leaving other gentlemen to come to their own conclusions for themselves. Sir, I have often refused to go into a consultation of party friends, when it was proposed to consider a bill which I thought involved important principles and of which I was in favor, or to which I might have been opposed, or a constitutional amendment, or the action of the Senate upon a question of importance with reference to the right of a man to hold a seat in this body. I have refused to go into consultation, saying that upon such a question I could not be bound by the opinions of others; I must judge for myself.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not like to interrupt the Senator; but he cannot have forgotten the consultation upon the admission of Colorado when the majority voted one way in the Senate and he the other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did I ever go into a consultation upon that subject?

Mr. POMEROY. I think so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; and when it was proposed that it should be carried in, I with others—one Senator particularly who now sits before me—gave notice that it might go in, but we did not go in with it; we would be bound by no such vote.

Mr. POMEROY. We certainly went in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. POMEROY. We certainly did have a caucus on it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator may have had one with somebody, but he did not have one with me.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Vermont I remember was in that caucus.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Vermont was in, and before the caucus began (if we are to have these family matters brought before the world and spread abroad) the Senator from Vermont distinctly stated that if the caucus expected any one to be bound to anything but an interchange of views he would retire then.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would have said the same thing if I was there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the reply made was that they did not want to carry the bill, but they expected to convince me, and I staid and tried to be convinced.

Mr. POMEROY. I remember distinctly the Senator being there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say I never went into any caucus on that subject. I utterly refused to have anything to do with such a subject in caucus. I know what my views were on that subject, and what I intended to do, and what I intended not to do.

Now, sir, upon all this matter of business: the business we will take up, when we will take it up, and the order of proceeding, I think a meeting, a consultation of the majority of the body who have the control of the business, may be properly held, as it often is, and when it is decided upon, being a matter of expediency, the decision should be binding upon those who agree to consult and do consult.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator just let me interrupt him there? I do not wish, of course, to interpose anything in his remarks; but he says, "Being a matter of expediency, the decision is binding." But suppose the associates of the Senator on the floor think it is not a matter of expediency; what then?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there is a Senator who thinks it is a matter of conscience and principle on which he cannot be bound by the decision, instead of making speeches one way and waiting and voting in the minority, and saying nothing about the principle, he should give notice beforehand and leave it to others to decide what they will do. That is my notion.

Mr. SUMNER. That remark cannot be applicable to me, for I made every kind of objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator asked me a general question; I have answered that question.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; the Senator will pardon me—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a question of time.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will bear in mind that in the course of the discussion I made every possible objection to this as unconstitutional in spirit; I made every objection that I have made on this floor now; and I said at the end that I could not be bound by the result.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not intend, it is not my custom, to speak of any particular gentleman and what he said there. I am speaking of general principles. Now, if the Senator says that he declared at the end that he would not be bound by it, I will ask him if that end was not after the vote was taken, and he had voted in the minority?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, it was.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly.

Mr. SUMNER. But in the course of the argument, the Senator will bear in mind, I had made objections that were on principle and vital.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And therefore the inference would naturally be, if it was a matter of principle and vital, that the Senator should have told his friends present, "I cannot be bound by your decision, and therefore cannot vote." Otherwise, if he votes on the subject, I think it is a waiver of his principle and his constitutional objection. That is my view of it.

Mr. SUMNER. That shows the necessity of this code.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I said before, the code is in the mind and heart. We cannot make a code for the Senator; he has made one for himself. If he is satisfied with it, I am. Each Senator must make up his own mind upon that question, and upon others; he must suit himself. I am not complaining of my honorable friend from Massachusetts. With regard to it, I am sorry that this discussion has gone so far. He seems to think I have imputed something. Not at all. I have asked gentlemen what their view was, because I want to know hereafter what course I am to take with reference to these matters, and what is to bind me. Now, sir, I think that, after all, this discussion, though it has been long and tedious, may do us some good. It has taught me one thing, and that is that we do not agree, all of us, upon what is the honorable thing to do under such circumstances; and as I am bound by a different rule, perhaps not a better one—I dare say not so good a one—it is not for me to judge; but an entirely different rule from other gentlemen, it is a warning to me not to get into such a difficulty again. Sir, I never, when a boy approved of the style of skying a copper and saying, "Heads I win; tails you lose;" but that seems to be a principle adopted here; we will go in, if we are a majority right; we have it our own way; if we are a minority conscience will not permit us to act according to what was the general understanding.

Mr. WILSON. I move to postpone the further consideration of this question for a moment, in order to refer the bills already introduced to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; let us adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us settle this question.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts postpone his motion?

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion if we can have a vote. ["Vote, vote."]

Mr. TIPTON. Before that vote is taken, at whatever expense to myself in the opinion of this Senate, I have one word to say. The Senator from Maine asserts, as I understand, that he is warned in regard to future action with men who differ in regard to what is honorable on a question of this kind. I was a member of that caucus. When my colleague in that caucus suggested that if we passed the resolution we might be precluded possibly from doing something, if an opportunity should offer, in behalf of our suffering frontier citizens and those of Kansas, I, taking that view of the question, from that moment voted against the resolution. Otherwise had my attention not been called to it I should certainly have voted for the resolution, no constitutional objection having ever once been intimated to me. After voting against it in the caucus, I come into the Senate. The Senator from Kansas notifies the Senate by a proclamation from the Governor of Kansas that the glorious little State of Kansas, the most glorious among all the States, baptized with purer patriot blood, and under circumstances so wonderfully peculiar that she has been the pride of the lovers of liberty throughout this land, and the world has looked upon her—that that glorious little State calls upon her citizens, who cannot give ample protection to their own frontier inhabitants, to go and help to protect the Government property of the United States, the Pacific railroad. Seeing the condition of things there in a more precarious light than I did see them the day before yesterday in the caucus, I felt that under these circumstances I would not be true to my constituents and my State were I to allow the behests of anybody, any organization, to cause me now to step aside from Kansas and her troubles, and Nebraska and her troubles, and say we will not entertain a proposition in your behalf. I should not be a man of honor if I permitted myself to act thus, and I say no Senator here could claim that he acted honorably if he had gone back upon his constituency under these circumstances. I am very free to hear from any Senator that he disapproves of my course and says I am not bound by a high principle of honor, as high as ever animated his breast; when with that additional notification from Kansas I say here neither caucus nor Senate nor power shall prevent me from introducing a measure if necessary for my own State. Charged distinctly with that, I part hands with any man and all men willingly.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose, Mr. President, we are all men of honor, ["Let us vote;"] but I do not believe this debate to-day will bring any honor to any of us, and I hope we shall close it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I would vote very willingly for the concluding part of the resolution, but I cannot and shall not for the resolution as it stands, including the first portion of the matter. I think, sir, it is very ill advised that in a resolution of this sort, introduced at this time, a judgment should be pronounced by the Senate upon those questions which are coming before us for discussion: those events in connection with reconstruction which have undergone debate in the country, and with reference to which this session is convened. As I understand the resolution, the earlier portion of it does commit the judgment of the Senate and declares its opinion upon questions which have not undergone any investigation, upon which we have called upon the President and the Secretary of War for information. It is therefore clearly premature, even although it should be eventually advisable for the Senate to pronounce the very opinion indicated in the resolution before us.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Drake, Fowler, Howe, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, and Wade—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Chandler, Conness, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—21.

So the resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 54) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Daniel E. Sickles; a joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John Pope, and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John M. Schofield, in all of which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the appointment of a joint select committee, consisting of two members on the part of the Senate, and three on the part of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the manner in which the act approved March 2, 1867, "to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen and for other purposes," has been executed, and report whether any and what further legislation is necessary and proper to secure the efficiency of the Capitol police force; in which resolution the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

REFERENCE OF RECONSTRUCTION BILLS.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary the bills introduced the day before yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator delay that while I lay certain bills of the House before the Senate?

Mr. WILSON. I move to take from the table the bills introduced the day before yesterday and refer them to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMEROY. If those bills relate to legislative proceedings, I shall object to their being referred.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill I introduced in regard to reconstruction, and the bills introduced by other Senators on that subject, and to refer them to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to that. I thought the Senator had reference to the bills that came from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to say simply that the joint Committee on Reconstruction have, I believe, been charged with almost every subject—

Mr. FESSENDEN. That committee is not now in existence. It has never been reestablished in this Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the House of Representatives has a separate committee of its own on that subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the bills mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to; and Senate bills Nos. 123, 125, 126, 129, and 130 were read the second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to refer the resolutions of thanks from the House of Representatives to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They cannot be referred under the rule just adopted.

Mr. POMEROY. I object to their being read under the rule we have adopted.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. The appropriate business has been referred to the proper committee; it will take them all day to-morrow to consider it, and we shall have nothing to do to-morrow if we come here.

Mr. POMEROY. I rise to a question of order. The bills from the House of Representatives refer to legislative proceedings, and I ask whether it is in order under the resolution just adopted to refer them to any committee.

Mr. GRIMES. That question is not before the Senate; the question is on the adjournment until Monday.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the resolutions from the House which are on the table be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands a question of order to be raised on that.

Mr. POMEROY. There is also a bill there in reference to the police.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is always usual to read bills from the other House, and I suppose they ought to be read the first time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would suggest, to relieve us of any difficulty about this matter, that the Senator from Rhode Island has a supplemental order to offer that will govern all these cases and save any wrangling in the Senate. If the Senate will allow it to be submitted now, it will, perhaps, be unanimously agreed to and prevent all further trouble.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is an order made necessary by the resolution just passed.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to hearing the order read.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. HOWARD. Let it be read for information.

Mr. ANTHONY. I submit the following order:

Ordered, That during the present session, all legislative business, when introduced or taken up, except such as relates to removing the obstructions which have been or are likely to be placed in the way of a fair execution of the acts of reconstruction heretofore adopted by Congress, and to giving to said acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed, be laid on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the consideration of that.

Mr. POMEROY. That is only another form of the same thing.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is an order to carry into effect the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the resolution is objected to, and it goes over under the rule.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CRAGIN. I renew my motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 5, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of Wednesday last was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER announced the following Committee on Reconstruction, ordered on Wednesday last:

THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, GEORGE S. BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, JOHN A. BING-

HAM of Ohio, JOHN F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, CALVIN T. HULBURD of New York, FERNANDO C. BEAMAN of Michigan, HALBERT E. PAINE of Wisconsin, FREDERICK A. PIKE of Maine, and JAMES BROOKS of New York.

JAMES B. BECK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the memorial of George M. Adams against the admission of James B. Beck for the seventh district of Kentucky to a seat in the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

DELEGATE FROM NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also lay before the House a communication from the Governor of New Mexico; and as this document presents a novel case, the Clerk will read it in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO, SANTA FE, N. M., March 13, 1867.

SIR: The Territory of New Mexico having no Delegate in the Congress of the United States in consequence of the change of time for the meeting of Congress, and the Territorial Legislature having failed to change the election laws of the Territory, so as to enable the people to elect a Delegate before the first Monday in September next, leaving us entirely without representation in Congress:

In view of these facts, I, Robert B. Mitchell, Governor of the Territory of New Mexico, do appoint John S. Watts, Delegate or Agent of the Territory of New Mexico during the interregnum, and until a Delegate is elected by the people at their annual election in September next and qualified, and ask for him the pay and emoluments of said position. If, under the rules of the House of Representatives and the laws of the United States, he cannot receive pay for his services, I most respectfully ask that he may be admitted to the floor of the House of Representatives without pay as the agent of the Territory for the purpose of procuring such legislation as may be necessary for the interest and welfare of the Territory.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and the great seal of the Territory this 13th day of March, A. D. 1867.

ROBERT B. MITCHELL,

Governor for New Mexico.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DAWES. I move to refer that paper to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have great doubt whether that paper ought to be referred to the Committee of Elections. To do so would seem to imply an acquiescence in an utterly unprecedented, unauthorized, and illegal act on the part of the Governor of New Mexico. It certainly ought to go no further than to be laid on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I believe with the gentleman from Ohio that this proceeding is unauthorized and unprecedented, and that is the very reason why I have moved the reference of the paper to the Committee of Elections. I believe that any paper of this kind, touching a man's claim to a seat here, should always be referred to the Committee of Elections. I agree entirely with the gentleman. I think probably the Committee of Elections will put something on record that will be a guide in the future. It is not because I have any idea that papers of this kind would be evidence of a right to a seat that I make my motion, but because I think that any paper that a man brings here claiming a seat ought to be referred to a committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I entirely appreciate the motives of the chairman of the Committee of Elections. I think there is no disagreement between him and myself in relation to the character of the paper. The difference is only as to how it ought to be treated, how it ought to be received, or how the House should decline to receive a paper of this kind. I do not agree in the broad proposition that whenever any one presents a paper here claiming a seat in this House we should, as a matter of course, refer it to a committee of the House. Suppose the Governor of the State of Indiana should assume to appoint Representatives here and send formal papers of such appointments, would you refer those papers? What do you want to inquire into? Does any man doubt whether the Governor of a State has a right to appoint a Representative in Congress? It is so obvious that this is extra-constitutional, illegal, outside of the power of a Governor of any Territory that to give it consideration by referring it to a committee appears to me establishing perhaps a dangerous precedent. Suppose some man should come here from Canada with a certificate in due form, or from Walrusia, although that would be a stronger case, as there would be a plea of necessity because there has been no action on the part of Congress. Here there has been action on the part of Congress, and without regard to the charter granted by Congress, the Governor of the Territory assumes to send this man here. Sir, we are about to establish a dangerous precedent.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman if Congress did not admit a Delegate from this very Territory of New Mexico before it was organized?

Mr. SCHENCK. I admit that; but it was not such an application as this, for in that case Congress had not established a territorial government.

But this case is one in which the Territory is organized, in which the forms are prescribed, in which the power of the Governor is limited and laid down by law. Here, then, is an attempt on the part of certain persons, not merely to throw themselves upon the plea of necessity because they want to be represented, no representation being provided for, but to override the very law providing for the representation of Territories by Delegates.

When I was interrupted by my colleague I was about to say this: however the House may decide this question, we shall now establish a precedent; and if the precedent be established that every paper of this kind is to be referred to the Committee of Elections, or any other committee of this House, (and no man has more confidence than I have in the ability of that committee to dispose properly of any question that may come before it,) the next thing will be a claim for mileage; the next thing will be a claim for pay during attendance here in order to prosecute this application; and the next thing, I am afraid, will be that mileage and pay will be allowed. Now, I do not put this question on the low ground of the mere money consideration; I am only speaking of one of the consequences that may follow. The ground I take is that here is on the part of the Governor of a Territory an attempted overriding of the law, a proceeding entirely outside of any legal provision; and this being patent on the face of the matter, we are all prepared, I think, to decide the question without its reference to a committee and a report upon it.

Mr. MILLER. This matter seems to me so plain as to require no argument. I move that the communication of the Governor of New Mexico be laid on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. MILLER. I will withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I proposed the reference of this paper merely for the purpose of giving the Committee of Elections an opportunity to make a report that would finally dispose of the case. This is not the claim of a gentleman to a seat as a member of this House. It is the request of the Governor of a Territory that this man may be permitted to come upon the floor and act as the agent of the Territory. If admitted, he will not serve here in any capacity known to the Constitution of the United States; he will be permitted to act as agent of the Territory, ex gratia, and not by virtue of any right of the Territory to representation upon this floor. The Governor of the Territory asks that if this man be not admitted in the capacity of a Delegate under the organic law of the Territory, he may at least be admitted upon this floor to act as an agent of the Territory.

This request of the Governor is respectful in language, and there is no insult to the House in making the request. I admit all that has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr.

SCHENCK] in regard to the want of power of the Governor in this case. The gentleman has anticipated all the argument that could be made on that subject by the committee; but notwithstanding what the gentleman has said, it seems to me that when a certificate, or anything purporting to be a certificate, from the Governor of a State or Territory, under the seal of that State or Territory, is presented here, and is respectful in form and language, there is no impropriety in referring that paper to the appropriate committee and permitting that committee to make a report. A report of the Committee of Elections on this case will, I have no doubt, settle the question, which seems to trouble my friend from Ohio more than all the rest, with regard to an apprehended claim for mileage and compensation. I hope that the House will agree to refer the matter to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MILLER. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was not here on last Wednesday, or he would be aware that there has already been referred to the Committee of Elections sufficient business to occupy them for some time. That committee will, I think, have enough to do without attending to this matter. Now, sir, what right has the Governor of New Mexico to send here a paper requesting us to admit to this floor a Delegate from that Territory? It is a proceeding entirely unprecedented; and we should avoid establishing so dangerous a precedent as to give any countenance to such a proceeding. I have therefore made the motion that the communication be laid on the table.

Mr. KELSEY. I rise to make a motion, which I believe will take precedence of the motion to lay on the table. I move that the application of the Governor of New Mexico be rejected. I think that this is the proper disposition to make of the application. My motion will bring the House to a direct vote upon the proposition.

Mr. MILLER. I think it more respectful to lay the communication on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay upon the table has priority. A motion to reject is equivalent to non-reception, which is too late at this point. When the paper is presented is the time to submit the question of reception. The motion to lay upon the table is not debatable.

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to the fact that the Territory of New Mexico is an organized political community, recognized by law, and that by their own act they have postponed the election for Delegate. Under the law, as is well known to the gentleman from Massachusetts and to every member of this House, they are not entitled to an agent upon this floor.

Now, sir, if the Governor of California should have sent here three gentlemen to represent that State as agents upon this floor under his certificate, they would have quite as much right, indeed greater right, to have those agents admitted upon this floor, or their application for admission to be referred to the Committee of Elections, than the Territory of New Mexico. I hope the precedent will not be established, but that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will prevail.

Mr. MILLER. I now renew my motion to lay upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to make a report from the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States. We report we have performed that duty, and that the President has informed us he had no communication to make to Congress at this time.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to present some papers in contested-election cases for reference.

The first is the petition of G. G. Symes, contesting the right of L. S. Trimble to a seat from the first congressional district of Kentucky, asking for an extension of time for taking evidence, and I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I present the protest of Samuel McKee, who contests the seat of John Young Brown from the second district of Kentucky, referred to on Wednesday last, and move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. PAINE. I submit the following joint resolution, and move to suspend the rules, in order that it may be acted on now:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the thanks of Congress be tendered to Major General Philip H. Sheridan for his able and faithful performance of his duties as commander of the military district of Texas and Louisiana.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 18, not voting, 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Forries, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McQuinn, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesky, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Calwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Marshall, Morrissey, Munger, Niblack, Noel, Ross, Stone, Van Trump, and Wood—18.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Brooks, Calkins, Cullom, Dodge, Eckley, Ela, Fawcett, Fox, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Ladin, Lincoln, McCullough, Morgan, Nicholson, Phelps, Platts, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Taber, Van Auken, Van Wyck, and William Williams—39.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

During the vote,

Mr. ORTH announced that Mr. CULLOM, of Illinois, was detained from his seat by illness. If present he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SHANKS made a similar announcement as to his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that his colleague, Mr. KERR, was detained at home by ill health. The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. PIKE. I appeal to my friend to let me move an amendment to include Major General Sickles.

Mr. PAINE. I have considered that question, and also the question of embracing in this resolution certain other commanders. After full consideration I have concluded it was best for each one to stand by himself. I have decided to offer this resolution independently, and gentlemen can do the same in each case. The gentleman can do the same for General Sickles. I decline respectfully to yield to his amendment, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS L. JONES.

Mr. GARFIELD presented papers containing statements in reference to the case of Thomas L. Jones, claiming to be a Representative-elect from the fifth congressional district of Kentucky; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ELECTION CONTEST—M'KEE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. GARFIELD also submitted the application from Samuel McKee, asking for an extension of time for taking testimony in the contested-election case in the ninth congressional district of Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. GARFIELD. I also move that all the persons contesting seats on this floor be permitted the privilege of the floor until otherwise ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest that the gentleman give the names of the contestants.

Mr. GARFIELD. I mean to include only those that have given notice of contest.

The SPEAKER. Those are all that the House has official knowledge of.

BLAKELY VS. HISE, DECEASED.

Mr. KELLEY presented the memorial and accompanying papers of George D. Blakely, asking admission as a member from the third congressional district of Kentucky; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ELECTION CONTEST—STEWART VS. PHELPS.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following papers in relation to the contested-election case in the third congressional district of Maryland; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Elections:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, having appeared as contestant for the seat of Charles E. Phelps, the member of your honorable body from the third district of Maryland, respectfully represents:

That availing himself of the time granted by the resolution of March 8, 1867, he did proceed to take testimony in support of the allegations contained in his notice of contest.

That a large amount of evidence was taken, which, in the opinion of this contestant, proved a general disregard of the provisions of the act for the registration of voters, since repealed, under which the congressional election of November 6, 1866, was held; but that said testimony was insufficient in law to entitle this contestant to the seat of the sitting member.

Under these circumstances this contestant relieved the sitting member from the necessity of taking evidence by admitting the insufficiency of his own and agreeing to conclude the case.

As it would be unjust to file a record of the testimony of but one side, this contestant has directed the justice before whom it was taken not to forward the same to your honorable body as directed by law.

For these considerations this contestant hereby withdraws his claim to represent the third district of Maryland in your honorable body.

Respectfully,
JOSEPH J. STEWART.

BALTIMORE, April 22, 1867.

BALTIMORE, April 12, 1867.

DEAR SIR: The evidence thus far taken in the contest for a seat in the Fortieth Congress presents no such features of serious controversy as will justify me in the trouble and expense of continuing the case. I therefore renounce all further intention to prosecute the contest, and will indemnify you for any reasonable expense to which I have subjected you therein.

Respectfully yours,
JOSEPH J. STEWART.

Hon. CHARLES E. PHELPS.

Upon the above terms said contest is hereby concluded.
CHARLES E. PHELPS.

April 12, 1867.

Referring to my note of this date, I desire to state in explanation thereof that an analysis of the vote of the district at the election of November 6, 1866, as compared with the vote cast at the presidential election of 1864, November 4, shows you were reelected by a clear majority of the vote which you received when first elected to the Thirty-Ninth Congress as the unconditional Union candidate.

The figures are as follows:

November 4, 1864, Phelps (Lincoln)..... 9,313
November 6, 1866, Stewart..... 4,568

Deduct..... 4,745
..... 4,568
..... 177

Yours, &c.,
April 12, 1867.

J. J. STEWART.

MEMBERS-ELECT FROM KENTUCKY.

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to a question of privilege, and preliminary to the motion which I propose to make I ask to have the paper read which I now send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Speaker and members of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, members of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, elected as such from the fifth, sixth, and seventh congressional districts in the State of Kentucky, respectfully submit this memorial and protest against the action taken by this House on the 3d day of July, 1867, in refusing to admit them to their seats, and in referring their cases to the Committee of Elections. They state that they and each of them have been duly elected by the legally qualified voters of their respective districts, in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Kentucky: A. P. Grover receiving a majority of 3,959 votes in the fifth district aforesaid over both his competitors; Thomas L. Jones receiving a majority of 5,901 votes over his competitor in said sixth district, and James B. Beck receiving a majority of 6,664 votes over both his competitors in the seventh district aforesaid, as shown by the official returns thereof signed by Thomas B. Bramlette, Governor of Kentucky, John M. Harlan, attorney general, and William T. Samuel, State auditor, at the office of the secretary of state in Frankfort, Kentucky, on the 27th day of May, 1867, which returns are filed as part hereof; these officers constituting by law the board of examiners in the State of Kentucky to determine and make returns of elections.

They state that in accordance with said election returns, and in pursuance of the statutes of Kentucky in such cases made and provided, said board of examiners forwarded to each of the undersigned and to the clerk of this honorable House certificates of their said elections, which are referred to as part hereof.

They state that they and each of them now and at the time of their elections aforesaid had and possessed each and all of the qualifications required by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and by the constitution and laws of the State of Kentucky, to be had and possessed by a member-elect of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; that they were each and all elected according to law, and that the returns thereof were duly made; that no question has ever been made in Kentucky or elsewhere, either by the candidates opposing any of them for said positions or by any other persons, either in their respective districts or elsewhere, controverting in any form the right of any of them to represent their respective districts in this House, or disputing or calling in question the legal right of any voter who voted for any of them to do so. Yet, notwithstanding all these facts, they state that when the members-elect from the State of Kentucky were called by the Clerk of this House on Wednesday, July 3, 1867, and Thomas L. Jones and James B. Beck, members-elect from the sixth and seventh districts aforesaid, (the undersigned) A. P. Grover, not having then reached Washington, appeared in answer to said call and presented themselves to be qualified as required by law, they were not permitted to do so, but on a resolution introduced by a member of this House, without affidavit, protest, information, or assertion from any quarter that proof either was in the possession of the House, or could be obtained from any source whatever, controverting the validity of either the qualifications, elections, or returns of any of them, they were not allowed to qualify and take their seats in this House, which they contend is their undoubted right under the Constitution and laws of the United States and State of Kentucky; but their cases were referred, along with those of their colleagues whose seats were contested, to the Committee of Elections, when neither this House nor any member of it had, or pretended to have, any knowledge of any fact which could in any way make such reference necessary or proper. They assert that such a course is inconsistent with and in direct violation of all the laws, rules, and precedents heretofore established or observed by this House in such cases; subversive of the rights of the State of Kentucky, as well as the rights of the undersigned and their constituents, and they therefore protest against it, and ask this honorable House in some form to revise and annul its action as to them and permit them to take their seats, to which, for the reasons aforesaid, they claim to be entitled.

The undersigned do not admit the right of this House to exclude from their seats, pending the contest, any of their colleagues whose seats are contested, but in this memorial and protest do not propose to do more than present their claims to their uncontested seats.

JAMES B. BECK.
A. P. GROVER.
THOMAS L. JONES.

Mr. MARSHALL. It seems to me manifest that the House did not act with due consideration in adopting the resolution passed here on the 3d. Here, as appears by this memorial, and as is known to the House, are three gentlemen from the Commonwealth of Kentucky, with all the proper evidence of their election as Representatives, and ready to take the oath as members-elect from that State, elected by large and overwhelming majorities, against whom nothing has been alleged or was alleged as an objection to their taking their seats prior to the passing of that resolution, who are arbitrarily deprived of their right to participate in the business of the House. The House has refused to admit, and has referred to the Committee of Elections the cases of gentlemen against whom no charge has been made, and the regularity of whose election is not questioned. I have felt that upon reflection the House would now, without hesitation, correct the grave error they committed on that occasion, and it is this impression which has induced me to seek the floor at this time. This right of representation is a sacred and holy one, and the American people will not look with indifference on the perpetration of such gross injustice against any State or district of this country.

Mr. SPALDING. Is there any motion before the House?

Mr. MARSHALL. I propose to submit a motion. I would not have risen to make the remarks which I have made if I were not strongly impressed with the conviction that in regard to these gentlemen the House did not act advisedly. I cannot believe that any deliberative body having regard for their own reputation would deliberately and advisedly perpetrate such gross injustice and establish a precedent so dangerous to the whole system of representative government. I move, therefore, that in the case of James B. Beck and A. P. Grover, members-elect to this House from the State of Kentucky, the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the question submitted to them, and that these gentlemen be permitted to take the oath of office at this time.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss this question further, but I feel called upon to reply to the remarks made by my colleague [Mr. MARSHALL] in reference to the manner in which this question has been passed upon by the House. The statement that he makes, that no charge is made against these men, is simply incorrect. The charge was made in the resolution before the House, and the statement was made that Mr. Jones and Mr. Grover, two of the gentlemen he names, were arrested and imprisoned for treason. I made that statement to the House, and I reassert it. I will go further and say that when the Committee of Elections come to examine the case of Mr. Grover they will find that the records of the State of Kentucky show that he voted to take the State of Kentucky out of the Union, and spoke in favor of it, and that for that he was imprisoned in jail at Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. Jones was imprisoned in Camp Chase for similar conduct, except the voting; I do not understand that part of the charge as applying to him. As to Mr. Beck, who is one of the gentlemen signing this protest, I am informed by credible persons, and I believe, that during the time the rebels were in Kentucky, he, under their protection, made speeches in favor of raising troops to recruit the rebel army.

These are the reasons which prompted me in introducing the resolution in reference to these men as well as the others. My object was to strike, not at the right of representation of Kentucky, but at the right of rebels to have seats in this Hall. The resolution was based upon these facts as detailed here by responsible and reputable persons.

Now, sir, I do not want to discuss this question; but I will say to my colleague [Mr. MARSHALL] that it may be fitting for him now to stand here and defend rebels in this Hall; but I am sorry to see a Representative of the proud prairie State willing to take upon himself the defense of any man who attempted, by either word or deed, to destroy this Government. I presume my colleague does it without a proper knowledge of the facts. If he does it, however, with a knowledge of the facts, then he is making himself accessory to such acts by his defense of them.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I will do so.

Mr. MARSHALL. My colleague's personal allusion to myself I do not deem it necessary to notice in any way. My motives for my actions upon this floor are always sufficient for myself. This mode of traveling outside of the question before the House to impugn the conduct and motives of members may be deemed creditable by some; but I do not propose to follow the example, or attempt any vindication of myself.

My colleague is mistaken in his statements here in regard to these gentlemen. I referred only to what occurred here the other day—to the impropriety of the action of the House at that time and the danger of the precedent that was then set. There were no affidavits presented against these gentlemen. Their election by an overwhelming majority is not disputed. No persons have appeared, or are yet appearing, to contest their seats. I say that the action of the House is wrong in principle, as well as unprecedented in practice, and ought not to be sustained.

I do not intend now to go into the history of these gentlemen claiming seats. I do not regard that as involved in the motion I have made. I do not know a great deal about these gentlemen personally; but I have been informed since my colleague took the floor that he is entirely mistaken in regard to Mr. Grover; that that gentleman was never during the whole rebellion arrested or imprisoned for treason or any other offense. Mr. Jones was arrested at one time, as a great many persons were during the rebellion. No charge was ever preferred against him, and he was finally discharged without any attempt having been made to present a charge against him, either directly or in any other way. These, as I am informed and have no doubt, are the facts in regard to these two gentlemen.

But, sir, suppose all that has been stated by my colleague were true. My colleague does not allege that these gentlemen have been guilty of treason. He simply says that they have been charged with it. Why, sir, a great many persons during the late civil war were charged with treason. It has been, indeed, a common charge against one great party in the country. These charges have been wantonly and inconsiderately made; and I know of my own personal knowledge that a great many persons who were arrested during the war upon charges made by miserable spies and sneaks laid down their lives afterward in defense of the flag of their country, and were at the time of their arrest as pure patriots as my colleague even can or will claim to be.

These are the statements, pro and con, on the one side and on the other. I repeat that no contestant appearing here up to this time, no charges being made against these gentlemen by affidavit or in any other way by any gentleman who knows or professes to know anything about the facts, it seems to me to be improper that they should, with their commissions in their hands, be turned out of these Halls and refused all participation in the deliberations of this body. If they have been guilty of any act that disqualifies them or renders them unfit to occupy places upon this floor as Representatives, I have no objection to seeing them turned out in the proper way, after a fair investigation of the facts, made in the usual way, and in pursuance of the laws provided for such cases; and when satisfied of the fact that they are personally disqualified, I would not hesitate to vote to turn them out of their seats. But it is an easy matter to get up a clamor of this kind against any one; and if this course be adopted, if precedents of this kind be established, it might be almost impossible to organize the House, because I imagine there is not a gentleman on this floor who has not enemies, and in whose district or State some person may not be found to prefer some charge against him; and according to the precedent established by the House in this case, the mere making of such charges is sufficient to prevent a member from taking his seat until the matter is inquired into. The injustice of the act and the danger of the precedent are too manifest to require further comment.

Another great objection, as it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to this whole proceeding, is this: It is an abandonment, as I have urged heretofore, of the rightful mode of contesting the seats of members upon this floor. It is changing the responsibility thereof. It is throwing the burden and labor of taking testimony, and the expense thereof, on the House and country, which the law in regard to contested elections places upon the contestant himself.

The Committee of Elections is directed to send for persons and papers, to inquire into what? No specific charges have been made; no witnesses' names have been furnished, and these districts remain unrepresented while the Committee of Elections, in an extraordinary and unprecedented manner, sends a thousand miles to the State of Kentucky for witnesses to inquire into facts in regard to which no specific allegation has yet been made. But I will not detain the House. This is all I desire to say now in regard to this matter, and as to the personal allusions to myself I do not propose to dignify them by further notice.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I was not here on Wednesday last when the proceedings of the House were had to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] takes exception, and I know nothing of his character beyond what the public journals show. I do not know that it is proper to comment on their character at this time. It is perhaps better to look at the matter as it stands; and while I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, as at present advised, while I should not consider it in the line of my duty to throw any obstacles in the way of the admission upon this floor of any individual bringing the certificate of his Governor, unless there was present at the time to meet it a specific charge which extended to his disqualification as a member, I also am quite clear, when there is present a well grounded charge to meet the certificate of the Governor of that State, and which extends to his disqualification as a member, it is the duty of the House, before admitting him to his seat, to ascertain the truth of that charge touching his disqualification as a member. That is only when the member is qualified otherwise; but if there is a question, an allegation of fact touching his right to a seat as a member-elect, he takes the seat provisionally and holds it while the House is investigating the facts whether he is duly elected or not. Now, sir, that is a different question to the one whether a man is possessed of the qualifications which entitle him to a seat upon this floor. And when a man is disloyal and has participated in the rebellion, as implied in the oath of office we are required to take, I do not know that the gentleman from Illinois disagrees with me in saying, if a man is guilty of an offence which would prevent him in truth from taking that oath, that he would not be qualified, and that in such case the investigation should precede his taking his seat.

If there are any other cases standing in this category, I should oppose their taking their seats until the truth or falsity of the charge has been made to appear. Whether there are or not I am unable to say.

Mr. WOOD. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections to let me state one or two instances in reference to the practice of the House.

Mr. DAWES. In a few moments I will yield the floor. I was about to say all I know about the case is what has been published in the public journals and what appears here this morning. There were some papers presented this morning, and with the credentials they are now before the Committee of Elections. My own idea is that the papers presented this morning, together with the gentleman's own motion, should be referred to the Committee of Elections. Although I cannot speak of the committee beyond myself, I have no hesitation in saying, if I find nothing to meet the credentials of any man claiming a seat upon this floor, that I do not know by what authority I should withhold those credentials from the House. Whether the committee agree with me or not I do not know. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, if there is nothing here to meet the credentials of a man claiming a seat upon this floor which questions his qualification as a member, he ought to be sworn, and any allegation falling beyond that ought to be referred to the appropriate committee to investigate its truth, and what is required at our hands on ascertaining its truth. That should be done after the member has taken his seat; but the question touching the loyalty and qualification of a member to a seat upon this floor ought to be made when the credentials are presented. When it is made in good faith and based upon evidence which justifies the making of the allegation I do not see why it should not be investigated. I move that the papers as well as the gentleman's motion be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. WOOD. If I understand the chairman of the committee correctly, in ordinary cases of contested election, where the applicant presents the prima facie evidence of a right to a seat in this House, he has been permitted to take his seat and abide the results of the investigation on the part of the Committee of Elections. I further understand him to say that where a question is raised as in this instance against some of the gentlemen from Kentucky as to their loyalty, the case in the first instance should be referred to the Committee of Elections, and the seats should be denied to the gentlemen claiming them until the committee make a report. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. DAWES. I do not hear the gentleman very distinctly, but what I mean to be understood to say is this: that a well-grounded charge made in good faith against any man bringing a certificate here which extends in its scope to his qualification to sit as a member of this House, should be heard before he is permitted to take the oath of office or occupy a seat.

Mr. WOOD. As I understand this case, there is one of these gentlemen who held a seat here during the whole of the last Congress, against whom there was no accusation at that time of any disloyalty during the war, and who has in no way been obnoxious, as I understand his political record, to this charge of disloyalty, and yet that gentleman [Mr. Trimble] is served in the same way as the others against whom the accusation has been made by the gentleman from Illinois. I do not understand that there are any specific allegations made against Judge Trimble.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There are some charges.

Mr. WOOD. Well, sir, it is nevertheless the fact that he sat here two years, during the whole of the last Congress, and no question was raised when he was sworn in as a member of that Congress; and he having now positively denied to my colleague the truth of a single one of these allegations, I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how it is that he is in favor of referring all these cases alike and indiscriminately to the Committee of Elections for investigation?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman does not understand me correctly, if he understands that I am in favor of referring all cases alike and indiscriminately to the Committee of Elections. I distinctly said that where there was a specific charge made against any gentleman bringing a certificate here, which charge extended to his qualification as a member of this House, and it appeared to be made in good faith, in such a case I would be in favor of a reference and investigation; but where there was no such charge, no charge to that extent, I would be in favor and would think it to be my duty to vote for his being sworn in. I think the gentleman has mistaken my remarks.

I will add further, that whether these remarks apply to the gentleman from Kentucky, to whom the gentleman refers, I am unable to say, for, as I have already stated, I was not here on Wednesday, and the Committee of Elections have had no opportunity to investigate the matters referred to them. I do not know whether there is any such charge against Mr. Trimble, who was a member during the last Congress. If, upon investigation, I should find that there is no such well-grounded charge made against him, so far as I am concerned my line of duty will be very clear, as I have already indicated. I do not speak for any other member of the committee.

Mr. WOOD. I hope, as this whole question has been already referred to the committee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts is chairman, that at the earliest possible occasion during the present session the committee will investigate and report upon it to the House. I think it is wrong to disfranchise a whole State upon mere rumor. There is no member sitting on this floor to-day who is not liable to be ousted from his seat under the precedent established by this House day before yesterday. Any man can raise false charges, and accuse a member of disloyalty, and so, upon a mere rumor—and we have nothing here but rumor in reference to the members from Kentucky—he may be deprived of his seat, as has been done in the case of the Kentucky members, depriving a whole State of representation. I therefore hope—and I appeal with confidence to the fairness and patriotism, as well as loyalty, of the gentleman from Massachusetts—that at as early a day as practicable during this brief session the Committee of Elections will report, so that those districts of Kentucky may be represented in this House.

Mr. DAWES. I agree generally to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] has said, but I do not understand that any gentleman holding a certificate from the Governor of Kentucky is kept out of his seat because of mere rumors. I do not intend to bind myself to any such course of proceeding; nor do I understand any gentleman in this House to ask the House to take such a position, or to ask that any man shall be kept out of a seat here a single hour unless there exists some well-grounded charges against him, such as have been stated here. If no such charges exist, I hope the Committee of Elections will be prompt in bringing it to the notice of the House, and I have no doubt that every member of the House will be willing to do justice to these gentlemen.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], the chairman of the Committee of Elections, whether the effect of a general reference, such as has been made in this case, of all the credentials will not be to lock up the whole case and leave the committee no discretion in making a final award in regard to the title of these parties to seats? It did strike me when the resolution on this subject was before the House at our last session that it ought to have been confined to the specific question of the disloyalty of individuals. I voted for the resolution, however, upon the suggestion of gentlemen that it meant that. I should not have voted for it otherwise. I was prepared to say that inquiry should be made where a distinct allegation was made that a man was disloyal.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me, in accordance with my views, that the proper course of proceeding would have been to refer the cases separately, where specific allegations were made that the member claiming the seat was disqualified, either by disloyalty or by any other disqualification. I think the whole matter is now before the committee and within the power of the committee. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that in the preliminary examination nothing further should be gone into than that which touches the qualification of the individual claimant to his seat.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to say that what has fallen from the lips of the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. DAWES] shows the necessity of some action being taken by this House to make the action of the committee conform to what is undoubtedly the law governing this case. I understand the honorable gentleman to say—and I entirely agree with him—that when a charge is made in due form, either upon the responsibility of a member or by petition and ex parte affidavit, against a person or persons claiming to be elected as members of this House from an organized State, the case ought to be referred to a committee; and that the presentation of such a case, going to the qualifications of a person presenting himself as a member, ought to suspend the administration of the oath to him.

But, Mr. Speaker, the point which I desire to present, is that if the committee should, after diligent inquiry, find nothing against the personal qualifications of Mr. Grover, who is named in the paper presented this morning, the committee, under the resolution as it stands, could report nothing concerning his case; and this gentleman could not be sworn in until the committee had acted upon the whole question submitted to them—inconsiderately, as I think—by the House on last Wednesday.

I repudiate altogether the doctrine that any member can exclude the entire delegation of my State by asserting in a speech on this floor that it is "reported" the elections were improperly conducted. I repudiate the dogma that any member from my State can be excluded by a gentleman asserting in a speech here that it is "reported" that he is disloyal. But if a member rises in his place, and upon his responsibility as a member, states, and puts it upon the Journal of the House, that a person accredited as a member under the great seal of my State is disqualified under the laws of the Union, I agree that then there is presented a case requiring of this House the exclusion of the person from qualification at its bar until an investigation can be had.

But, sir, in order that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections may see the force of my remarks, I ask that the resolution as passed by the House on last Wednesday be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that in the elections recently held in the State of Kentucky for Representatives to the Fortieth Congress the legal and loyal voters in the several districts in said State have been overawed and prevented from a true expression of their will and choice at the polls by those who have sympathized with or actually participated in the late rebellion, and that such elections were carried by the votes of such disloyal and returned rebels; and whereas it is alleged that several of the Representatives-elect from that State are disloyal: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the credentials of L. S. Trimble, John Young Brown, John Proctor Knott, A. P. Grover, Thomas L. Jones, James B. Beck, and John D. Young, members-elect from the State of Kentucky, shall be referred to the Committee of Elections for report at as early a day as practicable. Pending the report of said committee none of said members-elect shall be allowed to take the oath of office and admitted to seats as such.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, I beg leave to say that the last clause of this resolution declares as plainly as words can declare that none of these members, pending this inquiry by the committee—an inquiry touching the entire election in the State of Kentucky—shall be admitted as members, or allowed to qualify. I do not think, sir, that that is the way in which to dispose of an election by a State. I agree with the chairman of the Committee of Elections, that when a State which has been duly organized, and has been recognized as entitled to representation under the existing law, by the apportionment of 1862, sends its members here with certificates under its great seal, every member thus presenting himself, unless objection be made to his personal qualification, is entitled to be sworn in.

Now, sir, in the resolution as passed there is not a single allegation touching the personal qualification of Mr. Grover and Mr. Beck. There is not upon your records anything of the kind, whether resting upon the allegation of a member or upon the affidavit of a person not a member. My reason for protesting against this whole proceeding is, that if the principle involved is correct, then the entire delegation from my State may be excluded by the mere will of a majority whenever any member may choose to assert in a speech or a resolution that "it is alleged," or "there is good reason to believe," that the election in the State of Ohio was not legally conducted. I deny and repudiate the whole doctrine; and I shall vote against it to-day, as I did on last Wednesday.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I of course cannot tell what will be the action of other members of the committee. This whole matter is, as I have said, already before the committee; and this morning there are presented papers containing what appears upon its face to be some evidence touching the disloyalty of several of the men claiming seats as members from the State of Kentucky. I submit to the House that the best disposition of this subject is to refer it to the Committee of Elections, who will then have the whole matter under their control, and will make, I doubt not, without any unnecessary delay, such report as the exigencies of the case may seem to demand.

I agree with the gentleman from Ohio, and all that I have said has been in the same line, touching the sacred nature of a man's right to a seat here until something shall be presented concerning his present disqualification. I have no doubt the Committee of Elections in their report upon the record will do something embodying sentiments of a like character, and so dispose of this matter that we need not fear the establishment of any dangerous precedent. I therefore move that the papers and the motion of the gentleman from Illinois be referred to the Committee of Elections. I do not demand the previous question at this time, but yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to carry this discussion any further; but, sir, it seems to me I do not understand my own language, or else other gentlemen here do not understand it. Under this resolution, I care not how good lawyers gentlemen may be, or how good lawyers they may esteem themselves, I am satisfied under this resolution, with the proper construction which I am sure it will certainly get, where the charges against these men are of disloyalty, the committee has the right at any time to report to this House in order that the House may act on the question. It does seem to me that there can be no doubt in regard to that point.

The charge made against these men, made by papers filed, is that of their disloyalty, and the resolution tends to that point, and whether you divide it or take it in the aggregate makes no difference. Each one of the members against whom charges are made is mentioned by name in the resolution, and you may divide that resolution, or the committee may divide it, but the charge in the resolution goes to each and every member there named.

There ought not to be any fears that any great outrage will be perpetrated here. This resolution does not disfranchise Kentucky, as my friend seems to think; but as he is so much alarmed in reference to the disfranchisement of the rebels in Kentucky, I will inform him that the resolution does not apply to every member of that State. There is one exception—the name of George M. Adams does not appear in the resolution. Hence it does not exclude the whole representation of the State at all, but excludes those men who claim seats from the right to be sworn, until this question shall be determined, and that is all it does do.

I know perhaps it was unfortunate the resolution was not drawn up by some one else. If some one else had drawn it perhaps they would have put it in a shape to be better understood. I thought when I drew it that I understood it myself, and I thought that the House understood it when it voted on it, and I have no doubt that it was understood then as I now understand it, that under that resolution the Committee of Elections is required to report as soon as practicable, upon what? Upon these facts to the House, so that the House may then act and decide whether these men are entitled to seats; whether they have been loyal or disloyal. That is the whole tenor of the resolution. It was so understood then, and I think it is so understood now.

As a matter of course, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be understood by gentlemen who voted against the resolution. I do not suppose you could draw up any kind of resolution here which would satisfy the gentlemen who voted against it; at least I do not propose to do so. You cannot satisfy a man and convince him a thing is right when he is determined in his own mind it is not right; and you may introduce resolution after resolution against these members in any way excluding them until these charges are proved to the satisfaction of the House to be unjust, and they would vote against them. I do not propose to pander to the humors and caprices of any one in this particular. As I have remarked already, I think I understood the resolution when it was offered. I know I do, and that it means no such thing as has been suggested by some gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. DAWES. Before renewing the demand for the previous question, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] to the Globe, pointed out to me by a friend sitting near, showing that there is evidence reaching the gentleman from Kentucky who was a member of the last House. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I ask leave to introduce an amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I will hear it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. It is to add as follows:

"With instructions to report as promptly as possible in all the cases upon the one specific charge of disloyalty, and with power so far to purge the claimants on oath."

Mr. DAWES. I would yield and allow the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be offered if I did not suppose that the committee have absolute control over this whole matter, and can vote to-morrow upon that specific allegation against these individuals just as well without it as with it. Whether the committee shall be instructed to put them upon oath or not, they are required to take that oath before the House if admitted. I think the House had better trust the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he supposes he can make an inquiry touching the disloyalty of a member when there is no allegation against him?

Mr. DAWES. I will say in answer to the question that the committee will at once report back the credentials of any such gentleman, and he will be sworn in in less time than we have been discussing the question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the paper with the pending motion was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 65; noes 45.

Mr. WOOD. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not usually done.

Mr. WOOD. Cannot the vote be reconsidered during the session.

The SPEAKER. It can; the motion is in order.

The motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was agreed to.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL SICKLES.

Mr. PIKE. I offer the following joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Daniel E. Sickles, and move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the same:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the thanks of Congress be tendered to Major General Daniel E. Sickles for his able and faithful performance of the duties of commander of the second district of North Carolina and South Carolina.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to, and the resolution was read a first, second, and third time.

Mr. PIKE. I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. NOELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for an amendment?

Mr. PIKE. I decline to yield.

Mr. NOELL. I ask to have my amendment read.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman may offer any other resolution he pleases separately.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 17, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Ella, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koonz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Meureur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesky, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Washburn, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Marshall, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Noell, Ross, Van Trump, and Wood—17.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barnes, Blaine, Blair, Brooks, Calk, Callom, Dodge, Eckley, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Ladin, McCullough, Morgan, Nicholson, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Van Auken, Van Wyck, and William Williams—33.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL POPE.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John Pope.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. JUDD. I move a suspension of the rules.

The question was taken; and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. JUDD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATIONERY FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the same allowance be made to members of the House for newspapers and stationery during the present adjourned session as they are entitled to receive under the rules for a short session of Congress.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL SCHOFIELD.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to offer a resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John M. Schofield. I only wish to say that although he bears the same name he is no relation of mine; I wish very much that he was.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the House what States have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress of June 16, 1866.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WARD asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. MALLORY.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether under the Constitution Congress has power to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the several States, and if they deem it expedient, report a bill prescribing the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

The question was taken; and (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was received.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask a division of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not divisible. The rule on the subject is that the question shall be divided "if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House." That is not the case in this instance.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WOOD. I would inquire as a question of order, whether under the resolution passed day before yesterday, this would not come under the head of general legislation in case the committee should report a bill?

The SPEAKER. It does come under that rule.

Mr. WOOD. Then I apprehend that no such bill can be reported at this session.

The SPEAKER. But the rules have been suspended—that rule along with the others—to allow the introduction of the resolution. That rule, like all other rules, may be suspended, as it has been in this case.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, that the resolution be laid on the table, there were—aye twenty, noes not counted.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPITOL POLICE.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint select committee be appointed, to consist of two on the part of the Senate and three on the part of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the manner in which the act approved March 30, 1837, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes," has been executed, and report whether any and what further legislation is necessary or proper to secure the efficiency of the Capitol police force.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS, ETC.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the people of every nation of right have the control of their own Government respectively, and in their sovereign capacity to create, maintain, or exchange its principles and its workings in accordance with their own judgments.

2. Resolved, That this right includes that of quelling insurrections and repelling invasions, with the right to punish treason and usurpation at home and usurpation from abroad.

3. Resolved, That all people have the right to choose their own officers, and that all orders of nobility and all assumed right to rule, based on birth, are in opposition to republican government and obnoxious to a free people.

4. Resolved, That we look with anxious hope for the prosperity of all republican governments, and at this time especially for our sister republic of Mexico; and that we view with pleasure the information of the restoration to power of the government of her people over the self-styled Emperor Maximilian, of the so-called royal house of Hapsburg.

5. Resolved, That in the opinion of this House the attempt recently made to establish an empire in Mexico on the ruins of a republic would not have been made had not the United States at that time been engaged in a civil war of great magnitude; and that said attempt was part of a gigantic effort to overthrow and destroy the Republic of the United States, in which the slave power of America and its natural ally, the aristocracy of Europe, labored with preconceived and united interest; and that the fall of Maximilian and the annihilation of that usurped authority, were necessary to the success of republican principles and government in Mexico and elsewhere, and are eminently right and proper.

6. Resolved, That the people of the United States cannot look with unconcern upon an attempt to control the destinies of Mexico by a Power or Powers in antagonism with republican government.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to discuss those resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions are not yet before the House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] asks consent to offer them, or does he move to suspend the rules?

Mr. SHANKS. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. WOOD. I had the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] has held the floor from the time when he presented the resolutions.

Mr. WOOD. Well, sir, I regret that any member of this House can be found to indorse the barbarous assassination of Maximilian. I think it is discreditable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is not in order, and must resume his seat. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor, and moves to suspend the rules. The resolutions, having been presented by the gentleman from Indiana, were reported, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] rose, stating that he desired to debate the resolutions. The Chair then asked the gentleman from Indiana, whether he had asked unanimous consent to offer the resolutions, or whether he moved to suspend the rules. The gentleman from Indiana stated that he desired to move to suspend the rules, which he had a right to do; and he was entitled to the floor for that purpose in preference to all other gentlemen.

Mr. WOOD. But I submit that the Speaker awarded me the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York, supposing that he desired to object to the introduction of the resolutions, but certainly not to debate the resolutions, which are not yet before the House, having been reported solely for information.

Mr. WOOD. I yield to the decision of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Such is the uniform ruling on questions of this sort.

Mr. BOYER. Would it be in order to move to refer these resolutions?

The SPEAKER. They are not before the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the rules be suspended would it then be in order to move to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It would if the previous question be not demanded or seconded.

The question was taken, and the House refused to suspend the rules.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Mr. NOELL. I move that the rules be suspended in order to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the name of the people of the United States, we tender our thanks to Mrs. Lucy Stone for her gallant campaign in Kansas in vindication of the immutable principles of eternal justice. [Laughter.]

The rules were not suspended.

GRANTS OF LAND TO SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the rules be suspended in order to permit me to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the forfeiture to the United States of all lands granted to the several States of the South in 1850 to aid in the construction of sundry railroads, which grants have expired by limitation.

The rules were not suspended.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and also the act supplementary thereto passed March 23, 1867; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the select Committee on Reconstruction.

THANKS TO "PETROLEUM V. NASBY," ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, we have passed several resolutions of thanks, some three or four, to the commanding officers of military districts for the manner in which they have carried out the clear and obvious intention of Congress and the expositions they have made of the purpose of Congress. I think it scarcely fair the other side should not have some opportunity to notice the champions who entertain a different view of the subject. Heartily concurring in the resolutions which have already passed in reference to our military commanders, I submit the following:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are due, and are hereby tendered, to Rev. Petroleum V. Nasby, P. M., "at Confedrit Cross Roads, which is in the State of Kentucky," and Hon. Henry Stanbery, Attorney General, for their long, full, and able expositions, made from time to time, of the views and policy of the President of the United States on the subject of reconstruction.

[Great laughter.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move that the House do now adjourn.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, presented papers in the contested-election cases of Switzler vs. Anderson, Missouri; Birch vs. Van Horn, Missouri, and Hunt vs. Chilcott, Colorado; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. KOONTZ's motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at two o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Henry C. Sanford, of Centre, Alabama, for the removal of disability.

By Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas: The petition of James C. Fisher and others, clerks and enlisted men at headquarters, department of the Missouri, praying that such legislative measures may be adopted as shall secure a sufficient remuneration for their services performed.

By Mr. ELLIOT: The petitions of John T. Hardie, William Gregg, Robert F. Patten, and Erasmus D. Bench, all of Louisiana, praying for acts of Congress granting restoration of citizenship.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 8, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, of Kentucky, and Hon. REVERDY JOHNSON, of Maryland, appeared in their seats.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it in order to propose a resolution of inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On what subject?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is calling for information from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior in reference to our Indian hostilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I am inclined to think not, under the resolution that was passed on Friday.

Mr. GRIMES. A resolution of inquiry is not legislative business.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was thinking it was not legislative business. I do not propose to legislate on the subject, but to ask information from the Departments. I do not propose at present to act upon that information. If there be any doubt about it, inasmuch as it is very important to get the information to determine afterward whether we shall do anything or not, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to permit me to offer a couple of resolutions on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer a resolution. Is there any objection?

Mr. DRAKE. Under the rules of the Senate is such a unanimous consent ordinarily necessary to enable a Senator to offer a resolution of inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe it has always been understood that unanimous consent dispenses with a rule. I believe the Senate has always acted on that idea, that if there is no objection a thing may be done which any objection would prevent.

Mr. DRAKE. But the point I wish to ascertain is whether, if the Senate had not adopted the resolution which was adopted on Friday last, it would be necessary for my colleague to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer a resolution of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly not; he might offer it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He could not offer it without a day's notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It could not be considered without a day's notice if objection was made.

Mr. DRAKE. I understand it could not be considered without a day's notice if objection was made; but the point I wish to get at is whether, if that resolution had not been adopted the other day, it would be necessary for a Senator to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly not. Under our rules resolutions would be in order.

Mr. DRAKE. Then, sir, I object to any unanimous consent being asked or given in this case. The resolution which was offered the other day does not touch this matter, in my judgment, at all. The resolution is itself bad enough without superadding to it anything whatever. In my opinion, this is no legislative business which is barred from the consideration of the Senate by that resolution. If it is, if the Senate has in reality tied its hands, emasculated itself, made itself of no force, no power whatever as a coordinate branch of the Government, the sooner that resolution is repealed the better. I object to the whole thing of my colleague asking the unanimous consent of the Senate to do that which he is not under the necessity of asking the unanimous consent of the Senate to do.

Mr. HENDERSON. My colleague will remember that even though no rule had been adopted at all, a single objection would carry these resolutions of inquiry over until to-morrow, and my colleague could, even with the repeal of the resolution of Friday last, carry over either of these resolutions to another day. I desire this information to-day. It is very important to the frontier that this information be given. An Indian war is upon us, and we want to know the origin of it. We want to know the causes of it. We want to know whether it can be stopped or not. We want to know whether this expenditure of money which is now necessarily before us can be avoided. We want to know whether the lives of our citizens can be spared, and whether Indian hostilities with all their barbarities can be avoided. Now, sir, our State is deeply interested in this thing. We desire that the Pacific railroads, the two branches, shall be constructed, and constructed as rapidly as possible. No State in the Union is more deeply interested than the State represented by my colleague and myself in having these Indian hostilities speedily and permanently settled; and I rise merely for the purpose of asking my colleague, if not as a favor to the country, as a favor to me personally, that he permit these resolutions to pass now, not to-morrow but to-day, not the next day after to-morrow but this morning, so that this information can be furnished promptly. I do not propose any legislation at present, because I do not know that I shall be able to suggest any even after the information comes in; but it is due to the country, it is due to the Senate, it is due to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior that this information be furnished and that the country know why this war is being waged, what its probable length of duration will be, and what it is likely to cost. Therefore I beg of my colleague that he will suffer this information to come before the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE obtained the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he will give way for a moment to allow me to make a report with a view of getting a bill printed, so that we may have it early before us.

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow me to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received, no objection being made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred sundry bills on reconstruction, numbered 123, 124, 125, 126, 129, and 130, have instructed me to report a bill (S. No. 131) to give effect to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867.

The bill was read a first time by its title.

Mr. WILSON. Let us have it read in full, so that we may know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read a second time at length, if there is no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I rather think it should not be read a second time to-day. It is an immensely important measure; and when one bears in mind what occurred on Friday, and the disposition which was then shown by the majority of this Chamber, I feel that we ought to fall back upon all the rules of the Senate for our protection. The bill may be read at length, but I object to its proceeding beyond one stage to-day.

Mr. WILSON. Let us have the first reading in full.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has been read once. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first reading has been gone through with.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be read a second time, and then it can go over and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose the bill may be read for information.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to its second reading.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If there is to be that captiousness in the Senate I will report it as an amendment, and then the Senator from Massachusetts will not have it in his power to object to its second reading. I report it as an amendment to Senate bill No. 125, if we are to be annoyed by a captious objection of that kind. My object in reporting that form was because I thought it would be simpler for the Senate to see it as a new bill, as it is made up of several bills, and have it altogether; and I propose to have it read the first and second time and sent immediately to the printer, so that we can have it before us. The Senator from Massachusetts, however, objecting to the second reading, will compel me to offer it as an amendment, in order that it may be before the Senate at the earliest time; and I now offer it as an amendment unless the Senator consents to withdraw his objection and let it be read a second time.

Mr. SUMNER. If I understand the Senator, it is not his purpose to press it to-day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot press it to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not know since the vote of Friday what the Senate cannot do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand perfectly well that by the rules of the Senate this bill cannot be forced to a vote to-day, and I am very free to say I have no expectation of such a thing. I did not suppose it could be forced to a vote to-day. I knew the rules of the Senate would not permit it. If the Senator from Massachusetts persists in his objection, I have only to vary my report and make this an amendment, and then it would properly come up to-morrow, being the report of a committee to-day; but I should prefer having it published as a clean bill, unembarrassed by the others.

Mr. SUMNER. And I would rather see it so myself, if there can be a distinct understanding that its second reading to-day is not to be an excuse for pressing it on without proper consideration in this body.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Do you withdraw your objection?

Mr. SUMNER. With that understanding.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can make no understandings with the Senator. I have stated to him that the rules of the Senate do not permit it to be considered if a single person objects, and I do not expect it to be forced to a vote; but I do not propose to enter into any understandings with the Senator after the objection he has made. I have stated my own views in regard to it, and I have no authority to make understandings with the Senator. It cannot be acted upon to-day; the Senator knows it perfectly well; and I have no disposition, as the organ of the committee, to press it.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; if the Senator had said that at first I should have made no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. There can be no objection to its being read a second time and going to the printer.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I ask that it have its second reading at length.

Mr. POMEROY. Let it be read a second time, and printed. Of course it cannot be acted on to-day; but it can go through the stage of being printed and then considered to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his objection to the second reading of the bill?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read a second time with a view to its printing.

The bill was read a second time at length, as follows:

A bill to give effect to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867.

Be it enacted, etc., That the true intent and meaning of the "act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, anno Domini 1867, was, is, and shall be construed to be that the military authority of the United States in said rebel States, as provided in said act, was and is paramount to any civil government existing therein, makes all such civil governments subordinate to such military authority, and prohibits them from interfering in any way with the exercise of such military authority.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the commander of any district named in said act shall have power, subject to the approval of the General of the armies of the United States, whenever in the opinion of such commander the proper administration of said act shall require it, to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise, any civil or military office or duty in such district under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from, or granted by, or claimed under, any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof; and upon such suspension or removal such commander, subject to the approval of the general aforesaid, shall have power to provide from time to time for the performance of the said duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed, by the detail of some competent officer or soldier of the Army to perform the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the General of the armies of the United States shall be invested with all the powers of suspension, removal, and detail granted in the preceding section to district commanders.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the acts of the officers of the Army already done in removing in said districts persons exercising the functions of civil officers and appointing others in their stead are hereby confirmed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the boards of registration provided for in the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," passed March 23, 1867, shall have power, and it shall be their duty before allowing the registration of any person, to ascertain upon such facts or information as they can obtain, whether such person is entitled to be registered under said act; and the oath required by said act shall not be conclusive on such question, and no person shall be registered unless such board shall decide that he is entitled thereto; and such board shall also have power to examine under oath (to be administered by any member of such board) any one touching the qualification of any person claiming registration.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the true intent and meaning of the oath prescribed in said supplementary act is (among other things) that no person who has been a member of the Legislature of any State, or who has held any executive or judicial office in any State, whether he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not, and who has afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, is entitled to be registered or to vote; and the words "executive or judicial officer in any State" in said oath mentioned shall be construed to include all civil offices created by law for the administration of the general laws of a State.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the time for completing the original registration provided for in said act may, in the discretion of the commander of any district, be extended to the 1st day of October, 1867; and the boards of registration shall have power and it shall be their duty, commencing twenty days prior to any election under said act, and upon reasonable public notice of the time and place thereof, to revise, for a period of three days, the registration lists, and upon being satisfied that any person not entitled thereto has been registered, to strike the name of such person from the list, and such person shall not be allowed to vote. And such board shall also, during the same period, add to such registry the names of all persons who at that time possess the qualifications required by said act who have not been already registered; and no person shall at any time be entitled to be registered or to vote by reason of any executive pardon or amnesty for any act or thing which, without such pardon or amnesty, would disqualify him from registration or voting.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That section four of said last-named act shall be construed to authorize the commanding general named therein, whenever he shall deem it needful, to remove any member of a board of registration and to appoint another in his stead, and to fill any vacancy in such board.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the bill will be printed as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed under the rule, being the report of a committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask leave to report back—I believe they were sent to the Chair—the bills which were referred to the committee, and I move that they be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will pardon me, I suggest whether he had better not report back and ask to be discharged from their further consideration, which will leave them on the Calendar.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that. I merely made the motion to dispose of them, as the bill just reported supersedes them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion to indefinitely postpone these bills withdrawn?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will simply ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from their further consideration, if the Senator prefers it, and let them go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. WILSON subsequently said: I desire to move an amendment to the second section of the bill that was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary this morning, and I ask to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. DRAKE. It is quite evident to me, from the remarks of my colleague, that he misapprehended the tenor and scope of my previous remarks. I do not wish to be understood in any sense whatever as objecting to the consideration of the resolution which he desires to offer at this time. On the contrary, feeling as he does that the matters embraced in the resolution are matters of very great importance to the whole region of country from which I come, and of especial importance to the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, I desire that the resolution shall be offered, and shall be acted upon at once. But the thing that I am after is this: here is the first occasion that has arisen under the resolution of last Friday for construing its terms, and now my colleague rises and gives practically a construction to the terms of that resolution by asking the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer his resolution—not the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it after it is offered, but the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer it. I appeal to the Chair to know whether that would have been necessary but for the adoption of the resolution of last Friday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly not.

Mr. DRAKE. The Chair answers me that it is not necessary. The point of objection with me is, that my colleague shall not ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to do that for which the unanimous consent of the Senate is not necessary, and thereby practically give a construction to that resolution of last Friday which it does not bear upon its face, in my judgment. That resolution cuts off "legislative business." I deny that a resolution of inquiry adopted by this body, calling upon a department for information, is legislative business within the meaning of that resolution; and that is the sole point that I make. If my colleague will get up and offer his resolution, I will be the last Senator here to object to its present consideration. The thing that I object to is that he should ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer it.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there is no need of his asking the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer the resolution. It is only the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it that is necessary. This is no resolution of legislation, nothing that looks to legislation. He can offer the resolution when resolutions are called for, the same as he can offer a petition when petitions are called for; but if he wants the Senate to consider it he must have the unanimous consent of the body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution adopted on Friday last will be read, so that we may understand it.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, adopted by the Senate on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That the legislative business of this session be confined to removing the obstructions which have been, or are likely to be, placed in the way of the fair execution of the acts of reconstruction heretofore adopted by Congress, and to giving to said acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed; and that further legislation at this session on the subject of reconstruction or on any other subjects is not expedient.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt myself that the construction given to the rule by the Senator from Missouri on my right [Mr. DRAKE] is the correct one, that such a resolution as that offered by the Senator from Missouri on my left [Mr. HENDERSON] is not legislative business, nor requiring the action of the other coördinate branches of the Government; and it seems to me this is as good a time as any to have the question settled by the Senate, for I believe questions of order are settled by the Senate. I trust, therefore, that we shall have the question presented to the Senate, and that we shall decide that mere calls for information upon the Departments or the President are not legislative business, so that the question may not come up again in any other shape.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I was about to make that proposition. The Chair has a right, I believe, under our rules to have the Senate pass upon this question of order. The question will be, then, whether it is in order for a Senator to offer a resolution of inquiry; and the Chair would propound that question to the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. There cannot be any question about that; nobody disputes it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There can be a question about anything.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that open to debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose it is.

Mr. SUMNER. I would say then, sir, that while it would seem very irrational to cut off resolutions of inquiry, yet it seems to me that under the terms of the resolution adopted on Friday they are cut off. As I understand the business of the Senate, it is threefold: it is legislative, executive, and diplomatic. The two latter classes of business occur in what is called executive session, with closed doors; the first class is in legislative session, with open doors. All that we do with open doors, I submit, is legislative in its character. There may be no statute or resolution under consideration, but the information that is asked for contemplates legislation. It is preliminary to legislation; it is with a view to obtain information on which legislation may be founded. Therefore I submit that it is legislative in its character: in one word, it is legislative business. If, for instance, there could be no legislation on the subject, there would be no occasion for any such inquiry, nor, I presume, would any Senator think of propounding it. It seems to me, therefore, that under the resolution which has been adopted, the inquiry that is now proposed must be considered as legislative in its character, and hence excluded. Of course that brings us to a conclusion as to the irrational character of that resolution, on which before this day is out I hope to have something more to say on a more direct proposition. I forbear now going into it any further; but at this first moment I call attention to the incongruous and irrational character of the proposition which the Senate has adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is: Is the resolution of inquiry offered by the Senator from Missouri in order without the unanimous consent of the Senate?

The question being put, it was determined in the affirmative, nem. con.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is in order. Is there any objection to its present consideration? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior communicate to the Senate any reports made to his Department by commissioners heretofore appointed, or by superintendents or agents of Indian tribes, together with any other authentic and reliable information in his possession, touching the origin and progress of existing Indian hostilities on the frontier.

He will further communicate to the Senate, as far as he can, the extent of the disaffection among the Indian tribes; whether they are waging war as tribes or as individuals, and if as individuals, what disposition has been or is likely to be made of the friendly Indians formerly belonging to what are known as hostile bands, and that he make such suggestions as in his judgment will lead to the most speedy termination of pending hostilities and prevent Indian wars in the future.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer another resolution on the same subject:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the Senate any authentic facts that have come into his possession since the 4th of March last touching the origin, progress, and extent of Indian hostilities in the western Territories and the frontier States, and that he especially transmit copies of such orders as have been issued by the military officers conducting hostile operations against the Indians and such reports as may have been made by them to his Department or to superior officers and communicated to the Department, showing the causes and extent of disaffection among the Indian tribes, the precise character of warfare adopted or suggested for the suppression of the troubles, and the probable duration thereof. And the Secretary will further inform the Senate what number of friendly Indians has been segregated from the hostile bands, and what disposition has been made of them; whether they are on their reservations sustaining themselves or supported by the Government; also the probable number of Indians engaged in war, and to what tribes they belong; what reasons, if any, are given by them for their acts of hostility, and whether any efforts have been made or directed to be made by the Department to terminate the troubles by negotiation or by any other means than the continued prosecution of war. And the Secretary is requested to communicate such suggestions as in his judgment will best tend to secure a speedy and lasting peace with the Indian tribes.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution that I offered the other day in regard to Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking it up?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all the official correspondence between the Department of State and Hon. Lewis D. Campbell, late minister of the United States to the republic of Mexico, from the time of his appointment; also, the correspondence of the Department with his successor.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a resolution that I offered immediately after my friend from Michigan offered his, which is a little broader than his, and I happen to know that it would draw out some correspondence which the resolution of the Senator would not draw out.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let us pass them both.

Mr. SUMNER. My impression is that in making the call we had better make it sufficiently broad to draw out all that it is important for the public interests now to know. I should like to have my resolution read by way of reminder to the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. SUMNER on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the Senate copies of any correspondence on the files of the Department of State relating to any recent events in Mexico.

Mr. SUMNER. It will be observed that the language of that proposition is much broader than that from the Senator from Michigan, and will be applicable to some events that certainly cannot be embraced in his call. It seems to me advisable that while we are making a call we should make it broad enough to cover all the matters with regard to which there is an interest.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator must be aware that a call for any information concerning recent events in Mexico would not touch the case to which the resolution of the Senator from Michigan refers. That correspondence was with a gentleman in New Orleans, not in Mexico. We can pass them both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made to its consideration, the question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. Now I call up my resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has just been read. The question is on its adoption.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that it be read again. I want to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I am very glad that this resolution has been offered, and I trust it will bring all the information asked for. For myself I think it of vital importance that this information should be obtained. I have reason to fear that our relations with Mexico in all respects are not what they ought to be, and that the influence and position of this Government are not to-day what they ought to be in that country. I hope that the information now called for will be produced to the Senate and the country, and I hope the public judgment of the country will watch carefully the course of the Government in relation to the Mexican republic—a republic that should have the sympathies of this nation.

Mr. HOWARD. The resolution as presented by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is very general in its terms. I would inquire of him what correspondence or documents he expects to obtain? What is the character of them? What are the subjects to which they relate? We have had a newspaper report that the adventurer Maximilian was recently executed by the sentence of a court-martial after he had been captured as a prisoner. I wish to know of the Senator from Massachusetts whether the information he expects from the Department of State relates to that very interesting subject?

Mr. SUMNER. It does relate to the execution of Maximilian. I hope that the Secretary of State will lay before us all the proceedings with regard to his arrest and trial and execution. I hope also that he will be able to communicate to us the proceedings with regard to Santa Anna and his arrest, raising, as the Senate is aware, possibly a question of international law. I am not sufficiently conversant with the facts to pronounce definitely upon it; but the Senate is aware that there is a possibility of such a question. The resolution that I have proposed is applicable to all recent questions in Mexico, and I presume that it will draw from the Department of State all that they have on their files relating to recent events there.

Mr. HOWARD. I am happy to learn from the Senator that he expects to obtain information respecting the execution of Prince Maximilian. I hope the Secretary of State will furnish to us all the documents in his possession that are in any sense authentic upon that subject, in order that the world may understand what were the real causes for putting him to death; and I entertain the expectation that if the truth is fully communicated it will have a very powerful effect in correcting a sort of childish sentimentalism; if I may be allowed that expression, on the subject of the execution; in other words, proper punishment of one who, according to my ideas, was the most arrant felon of the present age.

The resolution was adopted.

CAPITOL POLICE FORCE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to offer a resolution of inquiry. I believe it is now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order; but, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to lay before the Senate certain proceedings of the House. I should think they ought not to be delayed. There is a resolution from the House, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint select committee be appointed, to consist of two on the part of the Senate and three on the part of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the manner in which the act approved March 30, 1867, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes," has been executed, and report whether any and what further legislation is necessary or proper to secure the efficiency of the Capitol police force.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection to its present consideration the question will be on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I apprehend that that looks to a report from a committee with a view to legislation and the joint action of the two Houses, and that it cannot be considered under the resolution adopted on Friday last. I make the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not know that the resolution of the Senate could bind the House. I am not sure whether a resolution of a joint character is within the scope of that resolution. The resolution adopted by the Senate was not a joint resolution. I am inclined to think that the resolution ought to have such a construction.

Mr. RAMSEY. It seems to me that the resolution of the House does not necessarily contemplate legislation at all. It cannot be inferred from anything on the face of it certainly.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have the last clause of the resolution read again, about the report of the committee.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And report whether any and what further legislation is necessary or proper to secure the efficiency of the Capitol police force.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand that to be a report for legislation if they find it necessary.

Mr. RAMSEY. When you come to that stage, then you might interpose an objection, but certainly not now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer this question to the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Such a resolution ought not to pass. This subject ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who have the supervision of this building. The question as to what may be the regulation of the police here ought not to be submitted to a distinct committee of this body, a special committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. It cannot be so clearly wrong, because the House of Representatives acted otherwise about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not bind us.

Mr. RAMSEY. Of course that does not govern us; but it is not so clearly wrong as the Senator from Iowa apprehends. They propose to send the matter to a committee.

Mr. GRIMES. We do not know under what influence it passed the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is that this resolution cannot be considered under the rule we have adopted. That is a question of order which the Chair will refer to the Senate again. It will have to be decided by the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not understand that there is any possible ground of objection to this resolution that can be found under the resolution adopted last Friday. It is not legislative business. It may lead in the future, at some distant period, to propositions of legislation. If those propositions come up at this session of Congress, then the attempt may be made to apply the rule; but as the matter stands at present, I do not see that there is any possibility of objecting to a resolution of that kind under the resolution of last Friday.

Mr. WILSON. Whether we have the power to do it or not, I think we had better not adopt it. It appears to me that we have committees enough now who have the care of this business, and we had better trust one of our own standing committees instead of getting up a special committee of the Senate on this subject. I think the best thing that we can do with that resolution is either to reject it or lay it on the table.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is ruled out of order by the Senate that is the same thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question as to whether the resolution was in order, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. DRAKE. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the yeas and nays are taken, I wish to say a word on this question. We have ordered by what now stands as a rule of the Senate that we will not enter upon legislative business, not upon bills merely, but legislative business, excepting the particular character that we have specified. Now, here is a concurrent resolution from the House which provides that we will now organize a committee intrusted with certain powers and duties respecting remodeling the law touching the Capitol police. If that is not legislative business, the very appointment of the committee to do that thing, especially with power to report a bill upon it, I should be glad to be informed what legislative business is. Without any disrespect to my friend from Missouri, I think I can foresee that if he succeeds in making this break upon the will of the majority as to what we are to understand by these things, he will have gone a large way toward opening certain other subjects which, as a patriot, I can conceive he has at heart, which we should not wish to enter upon, and use this as a precedent against us. We ought to adhere in a fair and manly way to the interpretation of the order we have made; and it certainly seems to me that is legislative business which calls upon the House of Representatives or the Senate in their legislative capacity to appoint a legislative committee to inquire into subjects of legislation and report upon them.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is how we shall interpret that resolution. There are two ways of approaching it. One is to regard the resolution as unconstitutional and inoperative, and therefore to be disregarded, so that whatever may be offered shall be treated as in order, that resolution to the contrary notwithstanding; and the other is, to insist upon its application strictly and to the letter. If the first mode is adopted, then the proposition under consideration is clearly in order; that is, it is in order, the resolution of the Senate to the contrary notwithstanding. But if the resolution of the Senate has any validity, this is a case for its application. The proposition before you is unquestionably legislative in its character. It is just as much legislative in its character as the bills that have been reported to-day by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, nor more nor less. If those bills are legislative in character, then this resolution is legislative in its character. Therefore, according to the letter of the resolution, it is clearly out of order, and the Senator from Vermont is right. He believes in the resolution. I do not believe in it, however.

Mr. FOWLER. I feel disposed to be governed by the resolution of the Senate according to the fair and reasonable interpretation of that resolution, and shall vote on all matters accordingly. I proposed to be governed in that way from the beginning. However, I think
